Gone into Mining.

Mr. R. Oliver took a trip up the lakes in June last, and became so impressed with the mining qualities of Algoma that he purchased a mine, bringing a quantity of specimen ore home with him. This he had analyzed last week in Toronto, the result being that the ore turned out as follows: Gold worth $2.40 per ton, silver ten cents, copper $24; total $26.50 per ton. This ore was simply surface ore, and Mr. Oliver thinks he has a pretty good thing in it. He will visit his property again very shortly.

A Successful Agency

Farmers should read T A. Blakely's new advertisement in this week's issue Mr. Blakely sells the best and most serviceable implements manufactured He disposed of a binder on the fair grounds on Monday to D Stinson, Esq., which made up the large number of eighteen binders during this season. The number of other implements sold by him was in proportion Had he not been handling the best implements manufactured this magnificent showing would not have been made

The Ancaranth Mammoth

Flesherton people had the pleasure of viewing the wonderful remains of the prehistoric [illegible] which were discovered [illegible] and a description of the Advance [illegible] The relics are really wonderful, and scientists cannot [illegible] the species of animal to which they belong; but there is no reasonable doubt that it was of the ox nature. The one horn shown, and which is the only one yet unearthed, is twelve feet eleven inches in length, and curves as gracefully as the most graceful of ox horns, but its immense size renders it almost impossible for one to imagine what the appearance could be of an animal with such an immense bone on its head. Nothing like it is known to science, and though every wiseacre has his theory to advance, yet none are agreed, which proves conclusively that on one knows anything about it Mr Jelly, the owner, is exhibiting it, and we believe it will prove a gold mine to him He intends to exhibit the remains at Markdale, Walter's Falls, and Walkerton.

Polished Him Off

A couple of weeks ago the Markdale Standard published an abject apology for the exceedingly small amount of reading matter which it publishes, at the same time taking occasion to remark that "there is not a local paper on our exchange list some 30 all told which gives as much local reading matter as the Standard." Last week the Chatsworth News polished Mr. Rutledge off for the above falsehood in the following style: Apologize all you like Brother Rutledge, and perhaps your readers will still think you owe them one. But don't you think it would look much better if you were to try and elevate your Standard, instead of endeavoring to pull your 30 local exchanges down to its level? There is nothing made by trying to injure your neighbors If you succeed it only takes a little out of their pocket and it don't put anything in yours. Blow your own horn as much as you will, and if you can't get up don't blame other people for your failure; it isn't their fault, its your own, and no doubt you have their sympathy. Besides it isn't business, and you are liable to offend your advertising patrons by publishing such a profuse apology for the appearance of their business announcements in the columns of your paper.

Accident.

R.J. Sproule, Esq., met with a serious accident in the Agricultural hall on Tuesday. He fell from a ladder, striking against a railing, breaking one rib. We are happy to see that his injury does not entirely confine him to the house.

Special.

It is with pleasure that we announce to our many patrons that we have made arrangements with that wide-awake, illustrated farm magazine, the American Farmer, published at Fort Wayne, Ind., and read by nearly 200,000 farmers, by which that great publication will be mailed direct, FREE, to the address of any of our subscribers who will come in and pay up all arrearages on subscription and one year in advance from date, and to any new subscriber who will pay one year in advance. This is a grand opportunity to obtain a first class farm journal free. The American Farmer is a large 16-page journal, of national circulation, which ranks among the leading agricultural papers. It treats the question of economy in agriculture and the rights and privileges of that vast body of citizens—American farmers—whose industry is the basis of all material and national prosperity. Its highest purpose is the elevation and ennobling of Agriculture through the higher and broader education of men and women engaged in its pursuits. The regular subscription price of the American Farmer is $1.00 per year. IT COSTS YOU NOTHING. From any one number, ideas can be obtained that will be worth thrice the subscription price to you or members of your household, YET YOU GET IT FREE. Call and see sample copy

The barns of Mr. Joseph Freestone, 3rd line, St. Vincent, were struck by lightning during the thunder storm of Sunday evening, and entirely consumed, together with all this season's harvest and a portion of last year's grain. The fire illuminated the heavens for fully three hours in spite of a heavy downpour of rain which continued for nearly an hour. The barns and contents were insured for $1200, but this will not more than half cover the loss which Mr. Freestone sustains. [Monitor.

Collingwood has been afflicted with another destructive fire. The Callary Block, consisting of seven stores, photograph gallery, dentists' rooms and telegraph and telephone office, was totally destroyed by fire Thursday night. The fire broke out in rear of Durnford Bros.' grocery, and the block being all wood soon spread to the adjoining stores. The losses are: E Callary, dry goods, stock partly removed and damaged; Durnford Bros, grocery; Hocking and McFadden, hardware and stoves; E. J. Telfer, telegraph and express office; Danford, Roche & Co, general store; Mechanics' Institute and Masonic Hall. These, all being tenants, lost their stock either by fire or damage. Callary's block, wood, is totally destroyed; Lindsey's brick block, occupied by Danford, Roche & Co., Mechanics' Institute and Masonic Hall, is considerably damaged but not destroyed. A heavy rain was falling at the time and little wind, otherwise the destruction would have been a great deal worse.

East Grey Fall Fair.

A Good Showing of Live Stock—Grain and Seed Exhibit Small, but of Good Quality—The Prize List.

For at least once in its life the Flesherton fall fair was favored with beautiful summer weather during the two days' exhibition. The attendance upon the first day was somewhat small, and the exhibits had not attained the settled and attractive appearance which they made on the second day. The exhibits inside the hall were not up to other years, but were all first class in quality. Fruit was very scarce, as also were vegetables, but the samples [illegible] each of these lines were good.

The Manitoba exhibit of grains, which was tastefully arranged in the hall, attracted much attention. Other special exhibits in the hall were: J. E. Moore showed a handsome set of parlor furniture; F. G. Karstedt, an exhibit of stoves; T. W. Wilson, an exceedingly handsome bedroom set in ash; M. Richardson & Co., a pretty case of silverware, in which was also shown an ancient flint lock musket taken from one of Prince Charley's followers the day after the battle of Clifton Moor, and an old sword picked up on the battlefield of Culloden. Mrs Beecroft showed an infant's dress over one hundred years old. Special exhibits outside the hall were: M. Cochrane, of Durham, mower; Beattie Bros., plows and hay carrier; J. Campaign, seed drill and binder; T. Blakely, binder.

HEARD'S CARRIAGE EXHIBIT

Mr J H Heard, Flesherton carriage works, exhibited a single and double cutter, top buggy, democrat and a lumber wagon. His exhibit was not so large as former years, owing to the fact that his time during the past season has been fully occupied in filling orders. The fine workmanship evidenced in the articles shown was the object of much admiration, and the general verdict was that Flesherton [illegible] anything in the line equal to the very best in the Dominion. Mr Heard's business is [illegible] more extensive every day as this work [illegible] [illegible]

The exhibit of live stock this year was considerably larger than last, but space forbids us particularizing to any greater extent. Altogether the directors are quite satisfied with the result of the fall show of 1889. Following is the prize list:

Among the Flowers.

Once, in the Morning Glory,
I had an odd conceit,
Sweet William was a bridegroom,
The bride of Marguerite.

And Violet was the bridesmaid,
She combed the Maiden's Hair
With a dainty bit of Cockscomb,
Found in the garden fair.

The priest, good Johnny Jump-up,
A fitting Monk's Hood wore,
And said the rite in silence,
As ne'er was said before.

"Now, may you Live for-ever,"
The guests united said;
Fair Lily, tall and stately,
Just bowed her queenly head.

Pu: Rose went up with blushes,
And kissed the winsome bride;
Here, too, was Bachelor Button,
With Daisy by his side.

When Blue-bell rang for breakfast,
They went in two by two;
How Bouncing Betty hurried,
She has so much to do.

They ate the Butter-and-the-Eggs,
The Honey suckles, too,
And then, from golden Buttercups,
They sipped the morning dew.

They fanned with Princes' Feathers,
And all were gay, I ween;
"No room is here for Bleeding Hearts,"
Quoth Lady-in the Green.

And some wore Lady Slippers,
And danced to music fine,
Of Lily-bells a swinging,
All in the glad sunshine.

So, from the Morning Glory
Till Four O'Clock they stayed,
Dear flowers of the upland,
Sweet blossoms of the glade.

AN AMERICAN GIRL.

CHAPTER III.

L'ARGENTVILLE.

Miss Belinda sat looking at her neice, with a sense of being at once stunned and fascinated. To see a creature so young, so pretty, so luxuriously splendid, and at the same time so simply and completely at ease with herself and her surroundings, was a revelation quite beyond her comprehension. The best-bred and nicest girls Slowbridge could produce were apt to look a trifle conscious and timid when they found themselves attired in the white muslin and floral decorations; but this slender creature sat in her gorgeous attire, her train flowing over the modest carpet, her rings flashing, her ear pendants twinkling, apparently entirely oblivious of, or indifferent to, the fact that all her belongings were sufficiently out of place to be startling beyond measure.

Her chief characteristic, however, seemed to be her excessive frankness. She did not hesitate at all to make the most remarkable statements concerning her own and her father's past career. She made them, too, as if there were nothing unusual about them. Twice, in her childhood a luckless speculation had left her father penniless; and once he had taken her to a California gold-diggers' camp, where she had been the only female member of the somewhat reckless community.

"But they were pretty good-natured, and made a pet of me,' she said. "And we did not stay very long. Father had a stroke of luck, and we went away. I was sorry when we had to go, and so were the men. They made me a present of a set of jewelry made out of the gold they had got themselves. There is a breastpin like a breastplate, and a necklace like a dog-collar; the bracelets tire my arms, and the ear-rings pull my ears; but I wear them sometimes gold girdle and all."

"Did I," inquired Miss Belinda, timidly

"Did I understand you to say, my dear, that your father's business was in some way connected with silver-mining?"

"It is silver-mining," was the response. "He owns some mines, you know——"

"Owns!" said Miss Belinda, much fluttered. "Owns some silver mines? He must be a very rich man—a very rich man! I declare, it quite takes my breath away."

"Oh, he is rich," said Octavia. "Awfully rich—sometimes. And then again he isn't. Shares go up, you know, and they go down, and you don't seem to have anything; but father generally comes out right, because he is lucky and knows how to manage."

"But—but how uncertain!" gasped Miss Belinda. "I should be perfectly miserable. Poor, dear Mar—"

"Oh, no, you wouldn't," said Octavia. You'd get used to it, and wouldn't mind much—particularly if you were lucky as father is. There is everything in being lucky and knowing how to manage. When we first went to Bloody Gulch—"

"My dear!" cried Miss Belinda, aghast. "I -I beg of you—"

Octavia stopped short. She gazed at Miss Belinda, in bewilderment, as she had done several times before.

"Is anything the matter?" she inquired, placidly.

"My dear love," explained Miss Belinda, innocently, determined at least to do her duty, "it is not customary in—in Slowbridge—in fact, I think I may say in England—to use such—such exceedingly—I don't want to wound your feelings, my dear,—but such exceedingly strong expressions. I refer, my dear, to the one which began with a B. It is really considered profane, as well as dreadful beyond measure."

"'The one which began with a B,'" repeated Octavia, still staring at her. "That is the name of a place; but I didn't name it, you know. It was called that, in the first place, because a party of men were surprised and murdered there, while they were asleep in their camp at night. It isn't a very nice name, of course, but I'm not responsible for it; and besides, now the place is growing, they are going to call it Athens or Magnolia Vale. They tried L'Argentville for a while; but people would call it Lodginville, and nobody liked it."

"I trust you never lived there," said Miss Belinda. "I beg your pardon for being so horrified, but I really could not refrain from starting when you spoke; and I cannot help hoping you never lived there."

"I live there now, when I am at home," Octavia replied. "The mines are there, and father has built a house, and had the furniture brought on from New York."

Miss Belinda tried not to shudder, but almost failed.

"Won't you take another muffin, my love?" she said, with a sigh. "Do take another muffin."

"No, thank you," answered Octavia, and it must be confessed that she looked a little bored as she leaned back in her chair, and glanced down at the train of her dress. It seemed to her that her simplest statement or remark created a sensation.

Having at last risen from the tea-table, she wandered to the window, and stood there, looking out at Miss Belinda's flower-garden. It was quite a pretty flower-garden, and a good-sized one, considering the dimensions of the house. There was an oval grass-plot, divers gravel paths, heart and and diamond shaped beds, aglow with brilliant annuals, a great many rose-bushes, several laburnums and lilacs, and a trim hedge of holly surrounding it.

"I think I should like to go out and walk around there," remarked Octavia, smothering a little yawn behind her hand. "Suppose we go—if you don't care."

"Certainly, my dear," assented Miss Belinda. "But perhaps," with a delicately dubious glance at her attire, "you would like to make some little alteration in your dress—to put something a little—dark over it."

Octavia glanced down, also.

"Oh, no," she replied; "it will do well enough. I will throw a scarf over my head, though; not because I need it," unblushingly, "but because I have a lace one that is very becoming."

She went up to her room for the article in question, and in three minutes was down again. When she first caught sight of her, Miss Belinda found herself obliged to clear her throat quite suddenly. What Slowbridge would think of seeing such a toilette in her front garden, upon an ordinary occasion, she could not imagine. The scarf truly was becoming. It was a long affair of rich white lace, and was thrown over the girl's head, wound around her throat, and the ends tossed over her shoulders, with the most picturesque air of carelessness in the world.

"You look quite like a bride, my dear Octavia," said Miss Belinda. "We are scarcely used to such things in Slowbridge."

But Octavia only laughed a little.

"I am going to get some pink roses, and fasten the ends with them, when we get into the garden," she said.

She stopped for this purpose at the first rose-bush they reached. She gathered half a dozen slender-stemmed, heavy-headed buds, and having fastened the lace with some, was carelessly placing the rest at her waist, when Miss Belinda starte violently.

CHAPTER IV.

LADY THEOBALD.

Oh dear!" she exclaimed nervously, "there is Lady Theobald."

Lady Theobald, having been making calls of state, was returning home rather later than usual, when, in driving up High street, her eye fell upon Miss Bassett's garden. She put up her eyeglasses, and gazed through them, severely; then she issued a mandate to her coachman.

"Dobson," she said, "drive more slowly."

She could not believe the evidence of her eyeglasses. In Miss Bassett's garden she saw a tall girl "dressed," as she put it, "like an actress," her delicate dress trailing upon the grass, a white lace scarf about her head and shoulders, roses in that scarf, roses at her waist.

"Good heavens!" she exclaimed; "is Belinda Bassett giving a party, without so much as mentioning it to me?"

Then she issued another mandate.

"Dobson," she said, "drive faster, and drive me to Miss Bassett's."

Miss Belinda came out to the gate to meet her, quaking inwardly. Octavia simply turned slightly where she stood, and looked at her ladyship, without any pretence of concealing her curiosity.

Lady Theobald bent forward in her landau.

"Belinda," she said, "how do you do? I did not know you intended to introduce garden-parties into Slowbridge."

"Dear Lady Theobald——" began Miss Belinda.

"Who is that young person?" demanded her ladyship.

"She is poor dear Martin's daughter," answered Miss Belinda. "She arrived to day from Nevada, where where it appears Martin has been very fortunate, and owns a great many silver mines——"

"A 'great many' silver mines!" cried Lady Theobald. "Are you mad, Belinda Bassett? I am ashamed of you. At your time of life, too!"

Miss Belinda almost shed tears.

"She said 'some silver mines,'" I am sure," she faltered; "for I remember how astonished and bewildered I was. The fact is that she is such a very singular girl, and has told me so many wonderful things, in the strangest, cool way, that I am quite uncertain of myself. Murderers, and gold diggers, and silver mines, and camps full of men without women, making presents of gold girdles and dog-collars, and ear-rings that drag your ears down. It is enough to upset anyone."

"I should think so," responded her ladyship. "Open the carriage door, Belinda, and let me get out."

She felt that this matter must be inquired into at once, and not allowed to go too far. She had ruled Slowbridge too long to allow such innovations to remain uninvestigated. She would not be likely to be "upset," at least. She descended from her landau, with her most rigorous air. Her stout, rich, black moire antique gown rustled severly, the yellow ostrich feather in her bonnet waved majestically. (Being a brunette, and Lady Theobald, she wore yellow). As she tramped up the gravel walk, she held up her dress with both hands, as an example to vulgar and reckless young people who wore trains and left them to take care of themselves.

Octavia was arranging afresh the bunch of long-stemmed, swaying buds at her waist, and she was giving all her attention to her task when her visitor first addressed her.

"How do you do?" remarked her ladyship, in a fine, deep voice.

Miss Belinda followed her meekly.

"Octavia," she explained, "this is Lady Theobald, whom you will be very glad to know. She knew your father."

"Yes," returned my lady, "years ago. He has had time to improve since then. How do you do?"

Octavia's limpid eyes rested serenely upon her.

"How do you do?" she said, rather indifferently.

"You are from Nevada?" asked Lady Theobald.

"Yes."

"It is not long since you left there?"

Octavia smiled faintly.

"Do I look like that?" she inquired.

"Like what?" said my lady.

"As if I had not long lived in a civilized place. I dare say I do, because it is true I haven't."

"You don't look like an English girl," remarked her ladyship.

Octavia smiled again. She looked at the yellow feather and stout moire antique dress, but quite as if by accident, and without any mental deduction; then she glanced at the rose-buds in her hand.

"I suppose I ought to be sorry for that," she observed. "I dare say I shall be in time—when I have been longer away from Nevada."

"I must confess," admitted her ladyship, and evidently without the least regret or embarrassment, "I must confess that I don't knowwhere Nevada is."

"It isn't in Europe," replied Octavia, with a soft, light laugh. "You know that, don't you?"

The words themselves sounded to Lady Theobald like the most outrageous impudence, but when she looked at the pretty, love-lock-shaded face, she was staggered—the look it wore was such a very innocent and undisturbed one. At the moment, the only solution to be reached seemed to be that this was the style of young people in Nevada, and that it was ignorance and not insolence she had to do battle with—which, indeed, was partially true.

"I have not had any occasion to inquire where it is situated, so far," she responded, firmly. It is not so necessary for English people to know America as it is for Americans to know England."

"Isn't it?" said Octavia, without any great show of interest. "Why not?"

"For—for a great many reasons it would be fatiguing to explain," she answered, courageously. "How is your father?

"He is very sea-sick now," was the smiling answer,—"deadly sea-sick. He has just been out 24 hours."

Out? What does that mean?"

"Out on the Atlantic. He was called back suddenly, and obliged to leave me. That is why I came here alone."

"Pray do come into the parlor and sit down, dear Lady Theobald," ventured Miss Belinda. "Octavia—"

"Don't you think it is nicer out here?" said Octavia.

"My dear," answered Miss Belinda. "Lady Theobald—" She was really quite shocked.

"Ah!" interposed Octavia. "I only thought it was cooler."

She preceded them, without seeming at all conscious that she was taking the lead.

"You had better pick up your dress, Miss Octavia," said Lady Theobald, rather acidly.

The girl glanced over her shoulder at the length of train sweeping the path, but she made no movement toward picking it up.

"It is too much trouble, and one has to duck down so," she said. "It is bad enough to have to keep doing it when one is on the street. Besides, they would never wear out if one took too much care of them."

When they went into the parlor and sat down, Lady Theobald made excellent use of her time, and managed to hear again all that tried and bewildered Miss Belinda. She had no hesitation in asking questions boldly; she considered it her privilege to do so; she had catechised Slowbridge for forty years, and meant to maintain her rights until time played her the knave's trick of disabling her.

In half an hour she had heard about the silver mines, the gold-diggers, and L'Argentville; she knew that Martin Bassett was a millionaire, if the news he had heard had not left him penniless; that he would return to England, and visit Slowbridge, as soon as his affairs were settled. The precarious condition of his finances did not seem to cause Octavia much concern. She had asked no questions when he went away, and seemed quite at ease regarding the future.

"People will always lend him money, and then he is lucky with it," she said.

She bore the catechising very well. Her replies were frequently rather trying to her interlocutor, but she never seemed troubled, or ashamed of anything she had to say; and she wore, from first to last, that insoruitably innocent and indifferent little air.

She had not even shown confusion when Lady Theobald, on going away, made her farewell comment:

"You are a very fortunate girl to own such jewels," she said, glancing critically at the diamonds in her ears; "but, if you take my advice, my dear, you will put them away, and save them until you are a married woman. It is not customary on this side of the water, for young girls to wear such things particularly on ordinary occasions. People will think you are odd."

"It is not exactly customary in America," replied Octavia, with her undisturbed smile. "There are not many girls who have such things. Perhaps they would wear them if they had them. I don't care a very great deal about them, but I mean to wear them."

Lady Theobald went away in a dudgeon.

"You will have to exercise your authority, Belinda, and make her put them away," she said to Miss Bassett. "It is absurd—besides being atrocious."

"Make her!" faltered Miss Bassett.

"Yes, 'make her'—though I see you will have your hands full. I never heard such romancing stories in my life. It is just what one might expect from your brother Martin."

When Miss Bassett returned, Octavia was standing before the window, watching the carriage drive away, and playing absently with one of her ear-rings as she did so.

"What an old fright she is!" was her first guileless remark.

Miss Belinda quite bridled.

"My dear," she said, with dignity, "no one in Slowbridge would think of applying such a phrase to Lady Theobald."

Octavia turned around, and looked at her.

"But don't you think she is one?" she exclaimed. "Perhaps I oughtn't to have said it; but you know we haven't anything as bad as that, even out in Nevada—really!"

"My dear," said Miss Belinda, "different countries contain different people, and in Slowbridge we have our standards,"—her best cap trembling a little with her repressed exciteument.

But Octavia did not appear overwhelmed by the existence of the standards in question. She turned to the window again.

"Well, any way," she said, "I think it was pretty cool in her to order me to take off my diamonds, and save them until I was married. How does she know whether I mean to be married or not? I don't know that I care about it."

CHAPTER V.

LUCIA.

In this manner Slowbridge received the shock which shook it to its foundations, and it was a shock from which it did not recover for some time. Before ten o'clock the next morning, everybody knew of the arrival of Martin Bassett's daughter.

The very boarding-school (Miss Pilcher's select seminary for young ladies, "combining the comforts of a home," as the circular said, "with all the advantages of genteel education") was on fire with it, highly colored versions of the stories told being circulated from the "first-class" downward, even taking the form of an Indian princess, tattooed blue, and with difficulty restrained from indulging in war-whoops,—which last feature so alarmed little Miss Bigbee, aged seven, that she retired in fear and trembling, and shed tears under the bedcloths; her terror and anguish being much increased by the stirring recitals of scalping stories by pretty Miss Phipps, of the first class—a young person who possessed a vivid imagination, and delighted in romances of a tragic turn.

"I have not the slightest doubt," said Miss Phipps, "that when she is at home she lives in a wampum."

"What is a wampum?" inquired one of her admiring audience.

"A tent," replied Miss Phipps, with some impatience. "I should think any goose would know that. It is a kind of tent hung with scalps and—and—moccasins, and—lariats—and things of that sort."

"I don't believe that is the right name for it," put in Miss Smith, who was a pert member of the third class.

"Ah!" commented Miss Phipps, "that was Miss Smith who spoke, of course. We may always expect information from Miss Smith. I trust that I may be allowed to say that I think I have a brother—"

"He doesn't know much about it if he calls a wigwam a wampum," interposed Miss Smith, with still greater pertness. "I have a brother who knows better than that, if I am only in the third class."

For a moment Miss Phipps appeared to be meditating. Perhaps she was a trifle discomfited, but she recovered herself after a brief pause, and returned to the charge.

"Well," she remarked, "perhaps it is a wigwam. Who cares if it is? And at any rate, whatever it is, I haven't the sligtest doubt that she lives in one."

"Facial Perception."

Mr. W. H. Levy, who is blind, says in his book, "Blindness and the Blind," that he can tell when he is opposite an object, and can perceive whether it is tall or short, slender or bulky. He can also determine whether it be solitary object or a continuous fence; whether a close fence or an open one, and, sometimes whether a wooden fence, a stone wall or a hedge. None of the five senses have anything to do with this perceptive power but the impressions are made on the skin of the face, and by it transmitted to the brain. He therefore names this unrecognized sense facial perception. The presence of a fog interferes with facial perception and makes the impressions faint and untrustworthy; but darkness is no impediment. A noise which distracts the attention interferes with the impressions. In passing along the street he can distinguish stores from private houses and doors from windows, if the windows consist of a number of panes and not of a single sheet of glass. A remarkable fact, bearing on the subject of an unrecognized sense, is mentioned by Mr. Levy. A naturalist extracted the eyes of several bats and covered the empty sockets with leather. In this condition the bats flew about the room, avoiding the sides and flew out of the door without touching the door case. In flying through a sewer which made a right angle they turned at the proper point. They flew through threads suspended from the ceiling without touching them, though they were only far enough apart to admit the passage of the bats' extended wings.—Youth's Companion.

Sheffield Workmen.

Mr. Julian Hawthorne, correspondent to the American workingmen's expedition to England, is reported to have said: "Our party has been immensely impressed with the solidity and substance of England; it has been quite a revelation to them. The skill of the English workingman, too, acquired in each trade by hereditary transmission from generation to generation, has struck them very much. We were particularly interested at Sheffield to notice how little of the excellence of English cutlery was due to any secret process, and how much to manual skill." In reply to further questions, Mr. Hawthorne stated that "the American workingmen had found the dwellings of our (British) workingmen very comfortable, and had also been much struck by the sobriety of the people."

Surg. Gen. Woodward, U. S. Army, says of the results of chronic malarial poisoning: "Disorder of the kidneys frequently complicates the condition under consideration. Scanty, more or less albuminous urine is often observed, and those cases not infrequently termitate in chronic Bright's Disease, with confirmed albuminuria, oedema or general anasarca." What at first is recognized as malaria is subsequently found to be Bright's Disease, which Warner's Safe Cure cures.

Draining the United States.

A San Francisco newspaper thinks that $12,000,000 is yearly "drained" by the Chinese through various channels from a city of 300,000 inhabitants. It figures this way: There are 40,000 Chinese in San Francisco. These persons earn at least $1 a day each over and above their board. That is $40,000 a day, $1,040,000 a month of 26 days and $12,000,000 a year. Most of this money it thinks goes directly or indirectly to China never to return.

Mr. Gladstone's library at Hawarden is one of the finest private libraries in England. It has more than 20,000 volumes. Mr. Gladstone loans his books out to any one in the neighborhood who wants to read them. Formerly people could keep them as long as they liked, but a few years ago the rule was made that a book could be kept for one month only. It is the regular ree library of the district.

HOW SOME GIRLS WALK.

Awkwardness Due to Lack of Thought and Lack of Training.

Why is it our young ladies do not know how to walk? Look! here comes one with her head pitched forward, her hands swinging ungracefully by her side, her feet scuffling the walk, and altogether presenting an appearance quite unbecoming one of America's lovely daughters, charming in all else, perhaps, but oh, such a gait! The next one walks with a jerk, her feet and lower part of her body having started on a race with her head to see which will get there first. The consequence is for every step forward she comes part way back with a jerk.

Her sister follows twitching ungracefully from side to side, rolling from one foot to the other like a sailor in midocean, only he has some excuse and she has not. The arms usually follow, but in opposite directions. The body of the next one makes a perfect bow, back bent, head forward and feet trying to catch up. Not one with the firm, graceful step, erect head, straight shoulders, easy arms and hands to be acquired by sufficient ambition and determination to prevent a dignified carriage. When will deportment be taught in our schools.—Saratoga letter in the Kingston (N. Y.) Freeman.

New Mountain Railways.

One used to think a great deal, writes a correspondent of the Independance Belge, of the Rigi Railway, with its gradients of from 18 to 25 per cent., those of the Uetliberg of 30 per cent., of the Burgenstock and of Territet-Glion of 40 per cent., of the Gueisch of 50 per cent., and of the Giessbach of 30. All this is now only child's play. Now one can ascend the Beatenberg, from the station of Beatenbach, on the Lake of Thun, by a funicular railway at an incline of 26 degrees, and Mount Pilatus is climbed by a gradient which is officially stated to be 48 per cent., but which sometimes attains to 75 per cent. The start is made from Alpnach, on the Lake of Lucrene, and in 90 minutes the summit is reached, the traveller being comfortably dragged in his carriage up the precipitous peaks of this celebrated mountain, which is more than 3,000 meters high. They assure you that the ascent is perfectly safe, and this is quite possible; but the fact remains that travellers are often much alarmed, and that many of them ascend only with their eyes closed and their hands tightly clenched. Railways are also in course of construction from Interlaken to Lauterbrunnen, to Grindelwald and to Murren. From Interlaken to Zweilutschinen this railway will have a gradient of 15 per cent.; thence to Grindelwald 30 to 40 per cent.; up to Murren the incline will be 50-60, a species of lift a couple of thousand feet in height! Crowds of Italian workmen will be set to work on it, and the new lines will be all ready next season.

Five-Legged Pigs.

Harvest goes on apace on all the company's farms. The crops with one or two exceptions are fair, keeping in view a season of unusual, if not unprecedented drought. The crops on the Dunmore are all safely in stack Tuesday of last week, and a long array of stacks are to be seen from the railway cars. It may be noticed as no small evidence of the fertility of the soil and climate of the Northwest, if not of the rare variety of pedigree pigs imported last fall by the above company, to state that the offspring of this rare stream of the porcine race are not unfrequently possessed of five distinct legs each. No wonder the company talks of opening a business; five excellent hams from every pig is doubtless an encouraging fact.—Calgary Herald.

What Are "Morganatic" Marriages?

The term "morganatic" applied to marriages, had its origin in an ancient custom by which the bridegroom on the day after the wedding gave his bride a morning gift—morganabe. In the case of a nobleman wedded to a wife of low estate this morning gift constituted the wife's portion endowment, and from this gift such marriages took the name morganatica. The German law, continuing this tradition, allows the members of the reigning house and certain noble families to contract marriages in all respect legal and valid, except that it gives to the partner of lower birth and to the children no share in the rank, titles and distinctions of the privileged house. Such marriages have often been eminently happy ones.—London Life.

Dying and Dead Souls.

Speaking of London, Cardinal Manning says: "There are four millions of living and dying and dead souls. And if every church or chapel or place of worship of every sort and kind were filled three times to the full on every Lord's Day, they could not contain more than 1,500,000. There must be, therefore, 2,500,000 who never can physically set their feet in any place of Divine worship or any place where the name and existence of God are recognized."

The Clan Cameron.

It is a curious fact that the fine old 79th regiment of Cameron Highlanders which is stationed at Balmoral during Queen Victoria's residence in Scotland, does not contain a single man in the corps whose name is Cameron. On the other hand there are no less than 360 Macdonalds in the ranks. It should be added that the Highland clan of Cameron and Macdonald have been on terms of bitter enmity for several centuries.

Dealing in Futures.

"Your brother ought to marry. He is too good a man to be wasted."

"But he thinks he oughtn't to, you know, because he's a minister."

"And why shouldn't a minister marry if he wants to?"

"I suppose it is because he may have a son, and you know what a minister's son usually is."

—Rachel De Willis, a colored woman of Yamcaw, Ga., is gradually turning white. The skin of her face began to change color three weeks ago, and at present nearly her entire body has changed its hue.

—The Queen of Greece is a blonde, with brown hair, regular features and a beautiful neck and shoulders. She dresses very simply, except on state occasions, and often goes about Athens without even a maid to attend her.

  Wherein to [illegible]
No strange re tween its covers look,
  Or, glimpsing, feel no anxious need.
The utmost trust she asks of me,
  That trust where two twin natures blend
My comrades woo right gallantly—
  But I would rather be her friend

We read for hours in quiet nooks,
  The few deep authors of our choice;
Somehow, the music of the brooks
  Is not so sweet as her low voice—
And while the breakers strike the beach
  And over, under curve and bend,
Her heart my heart doth truly teach,
  Until—but I must be her friend

Sometimes the thought will daring rise
  When touch of hand has thrilled me through
And in her tender girlish eyes
  One sees the heavens reflected blue—
What would I do if she some day
  Her wedding cards to me should send—
I could not truly, frankly say
  'Tis better just to be her friend

—[illegible]

Two Years.

[illegible]

They strolled on the beach by the bright summer sea
  He and she
And they never paid any attention to me
  He and she.
His hair was superb and to all that he said
She modestly listened and hung down her head
While with swift-dying blushes, her fair face grew red—
  Dear me

II.—This Year.

Again they are seen on the beach by the sea,
  She and he;
That they are married this year you will quickly agree.
  She and he
In silence he stalks while she lays down the law,
A man more submissive the world never saw
He's learned that a kitten has claws in her paw
  Dear me.

How a Jockey Feels in a Race.

George Taylor is an Englishman. He has been riding all this season for the Dwyer Brothers, but has just severed his connection with that stable.

"How do you feel when riding in a race?" he was asked recently.

"Just as though I was all strung on wire. It's a very exciting feeling, and one very hard to describe. I believe that there are many riders who know nothing from the fall of the flag until the finishing post is passed. The first time I rode on a fast horse I was almost scared out of my wits I had often ridden horses slowly, but never at any speed. I was put on a young horse to ride a five-furlong trial. Away we went, and I just remember how I clung to that colt. The horse ran purely on his own courage and without any assistance from me. In a race I seem to become almost intoxicated. I forget everything except the horse. To hear the sound of other hoof beats on the track is only to give me a desire to leave them behind, and if I am riding a good horse I have to restrain myself as well as the horse or I should just run right away from everything. It is hard sometimes after a race to remember how I rode. I think the air sharpens one's instincts, and then we guide the horses just naturally. I have very often shuddered when I have thought of the great chances I have taken. A rider, you know, takes his life in his own hands, and I think when he rides in a race he loses his sense of the dangers and just remembers that there is fame for him for winning the race, and money also. A jockey's life is a very dangerous one. It is said we either break our necks or make our fortune. My neck is sound so far, but my fortune is not made yet.—Philadelphia Press.

A Remedy for Prickly Heat.

I have just discovered that if any person subject to prickly heat in summer will bathe the places in a weak solution of alaratus water and dry them with a soft, cloth, and afterwards powder them with a powder made of equal parts of fuller's earth and rice flour, they will have perfect ease. It should be done night and morning in the hot weather, and if a mosquito bites you, don't try any heroic remedy, but simply apply a little cold cream, which somehow overcomes the poison and irritation when nothing else will. I have seen children that were nearly wild with the irritation of many mosquito bites calmed in a moment by the application of cold cream.—Olive Harper in Lippincott.

A Trinidad Mutiny Suppressed.

A New York despatch says: Advices from Bolivia state that a mutiny occurred some time ago in Trinidad, the capital of the Beni Department. The revolting troops were joined by the citizens, and they offered a stubborn resistance for some hours. The mutineers surrendered after the loss of twenty-four of their number. Of the attacking force eleven were killed or wounded.

The Old Resident.

"Have a pleasant time at the banquet last night, Major?" inquired the Colonel.

"Not at all, sir, not at all. There was an old resident present, who told us how the city had changed since he first came here."—St. Joseph News.

Life's Phases.

Henrietta's gone to Vassar, gum, gum, gum
Louise is at the singing school, hum, hum, hum
Tom is in the melon patch, mum, mum, mum
Bill is in the bar-room, rum, rum, rum!
Father's at the counting room, sum, sum, sum
Kate and Ned are all alone, yum, yum, yum!

Sir Francis Grenfell has gone over the heads of between 80 and 90 colonels, who stood senior to him, on his promotion to the rank of major-general; but none of them will dispute his claim to the distinction after the able manner in which he has twice disposed of the troublesome enemy who has threatened the dominions of the Khedive. Both at Suakim last December and at Toski the arrangements were excellent, and the programme was admirably carried out.

THE GIRLS OF SPAIN.

How the Dark Eyed Beauties Make Themselves Look Fascinating.

The traveller through Spain sees the young girls, anywhere, as beautiful as angels. They are tall, straight as an arrow, with the most perfect figures, and with faces which for a dark, tender, sad beauty are unexampled. The magnificent hair, always clean, always combed, always marvellously dressed, with the inevitable flower in it, is alike the distinguishing mark of the poorest as well as the richest Spanish woman. In this respect the Spanish woman is unlike any other. Even Italy, the sister peninsula, so closely connected with Spain in the past—Italy has no such disunction. The Italian peasant does not take such care of her hair, nor does the Italian lady manifest the pride, the neatness, the coquetry of fresh flowers, as does the Spaniard. That beautiful undulating hair, so blue black, with a rose hidden in its tresses—it is the joy of Spanish travel to look at these heads.

In going into small shops and humble quarters one often sees the business of hair dressing in progress. One sister is dressing the hair of another, or the mother is arranging the coiffure, etc. They have little heated irons, with which they frizz the one side and the other is allowed to go smooth. It is always becoming to the face beneath it. They wear it much over the face, avoiding the Chinese style. Little curls around the ears or pushing forward on the temples show that the Spanish woman values the purpose of hair, which is to shade the eye and contrast with the complexion. At the back of the head the coque is always carefully brushed up. The coque gives that character to the back of the head which is so essentially Spanish. It is a remnant of the high comb days and the mantilla. The high comb is now seldom worn, but the hair is always dressed high on the head—a natural crown which any queen might envy.

The Spanish eye, large, humid, tender, grand, languishing, furnished with lashes so long, so curling and so beautiful that the pencil of the artist fails to despair, the black pupil, the white sea, in which the lustrous orb sails—all is indescribable. Spanish eyes are sad. Spanish women, when they are not coquetting and laughing, have a sad expression. Is there a little of the Orient left in their expression? Is it Moorish, and does it speak of the harem and the inevitable heart-break? Next to the beauty of hair and eye comes the beauty of the flashing teeth. These are so universally perfect that the student of dentistry should go to Spain and find out how they manage it. There is very little good eating in Spain. Perhaps these faultless teeth are not spoiled by cakes and pastry and sweets in childhood. But the careless traveller expects to be rewarded when the Spanish woman smiles with a row of pearls, and he is almost never disappointed.—Cor. Philadelphia Times.

The Mistassini Mystery Disappears.

The Toronto World this morning presents to its readers an account of the trip recently made by Mr. W. J. Loudon and Mr. G. S. Macdonald to Lake Mistassini. Considering the country they travelled through, the time they consumed, the obstacles they overcame and the risks they ran from want of provisions, their expedition is one of the most rapid and most successful ever made by travellers in the unexplored and unknown regions of Northern Canada. Lake Mistassini lies about 300 miles north of Lake St. John, in the Province of Quebec, and between Hudson Bay and Labrador. The Rupert's River, which drains this lake, falls into Hudson Bay about 400 miles from Mistassini. The Hudson Bay Company have a post on Mistassini and take in their supplies by the Rupert's River route, which, though longer, is much more accessible than from Lake St. John, the starting point of Mr. Loudon and Mr. Macdonald.

What has been called the Mistassini mystery has been dissolved by the journey of these gentlemen. Instead of an immense lake, greater than Superior, as has been current for years, the lake is about one hundred miles long and twenty broad, with a chain of islands running up the centre; and parallel to it, on one of its sides, is another lake of similar shape, making three in all. But the three of them put together would make a very inferior comparison with Lake Ontario. The mystery imparted to Mistassini rests entirely on the tales of men who had never visited it, but who had come in contact with Indians who knew something of these waters and who had been impressed by the terrible privations endured by Montagnais and Nasquapees and the other hunters who dwell in that inhospitable country. Most of those who had previously written about Mistassini, not having any facts to present as to its geographical and other characteristics, succeeded in creating a mystery and a terror in regard to it. The Hudson Bay Company, too, it would appear, seem to have been satisfied that the country should remain under the shadow of the mysterious, as their trading monopoly is best protected by the absence of intrusion of any kind. The country about Mistassini, as we learn from the expedition of these gentlemen, is a very poor one, totally unfit for settlement, with little or no timber, inhabited by only a few Indian hunters and their families, whose members are steadily decreasing, marked by an animal life limited to bears and beavers and a few other fur-bearing animals. A land, in the short summer, of heavy rains, and in the winter of nothing but ice and snow for more than eight months in the year. Streams, lakes and rivers, and rushing rapids seem to be everywhere.

To relieve brides-elect of the labor and anxiety which usually attend the preparations for a wedding, an angel of propriety has appeared in London, and she agrees, for a stipulated sum, to make all necessary arrangements. This personage is called "the wedding superintendent." For some weeks preceding the happy day she is installed in the house, and her presence is soon felt. She selects the trousseau, advises what is latest and finest in underwear, buys the material, superintends the making of the gowns, chooses stockings, boots, gloves, laces and handkerchiefs; in fact, attends to every detail, so that the fair bride, unvexed by worrying details, will look her loveliest on the wedding day.

THE CHILD IN THE MILL.

A Picture of Children in Industrial Slavery.

A pallid little child toils in the factory; his mates are as wan and pale as he. When at evening from work he creeps homeward, tired and limp, he sees the merry schoolboys strolling back from play, hearty and plump faced, laughing, leaping, carelessly swinging their bats, at random tossing a ball, full of fun and sport, hungry from the fresh air and healthy exercise. He never meets them going schoolward; when they begin to store up in their brains more of life's wonderful story than they knew yesterday, already, for two hours, he has been at work. Brief and rare are the snatches of the story that may reach his ears while yet they are open to receive it. Ever the task unending, the same thing over hour after hour, day after day, week after week, month after month, year after year. How he would like to laugh and leap and play! But childhood's privilege for him was long ago abridged. Still, now and then his thoughts make daring sport while his hands keep on unceasing at their task: "What fun 'twould be to snarl up all these threads, and let the shuttles jump about all helter skelter, like rats in the basement when the river rises and drowns them out!" But the play for him exists in thoughts alone, and soon even thoughts of play will cease, since the stream of knowledge is turned away from him and dulled by lack of use, like a well made tool grown rusty, he soon forgets to think at all. The gates of his mind swing heavily to and open only to the duties known to the sentry by accustomed entrance to serve coarse daily wants. Then, plodding, he goes through life with body distorted and stunted, with soul repressed and crushed—perhaps he vaguely wonders why this unsightly ruin of God's most holy temple. Yes, why is it thus in a nation called free? Why is it thus amid a people professing love of Him who loved little children? What offence can be charged against these little ones, condemned to early toil and slowly darkening minds—while learning's lamp stands freely lit to guide their fortune favored fellows? Perchance for lack of merit? Great indeed is their offence! Their parents are poor, and therefore have need of the brats that they breed! Yes, the children are slaves, and a barbarous State mocks their bondage with laws that their owners must break. For enactments declare that the child shall be schooled, but 'tis easy to lie in a matter of age, and no one especially cares. So the child slaves keep toiling on, and strong armed men in vain seek work, or work for scanty hire, for the lords of the mills have greed cheap to them is child labor, and gold is more precious than souls in their eyes, but dear comes that toil to the State. In ancient times 'twas thought no wall could ever stand unless with the blood of slaves the mortar was mixed. We now are wiser, we deem, since superstition rules us no more. Still, upon our mill owners heads lies the guilt for the blood of those held in bondage—blood that might swell the veins of the children, were they not held captive within factory walls. —Sylvester Baxter in the Pilot.

How to Cook Steak.

Now if you only knew how to cook a steak to make it good that would do, but it always makes me sick to see a woman cook a steak. She invariably puts her frying pan on the stove, and puts in a chunk of grease about as big as my fist, and when it is hot enough to begin to crackle she puts in her beef and never thinks of covering it. The smoke and steam from it goes to the very ceiling. After she cooks it this way until it begins to look like an old rubber shoe sole she calls it done. When you go to eat it there is no more taste in it than a chip. Now, if you want a good bit of steak have a clear, hot fire, set your clean, empty pan on a spot, cover it up, then pound your steak, and when your pan is very hot lay in your steak and cover quickly. As soon as it has crisped enough to let go its hold on the pan, turn over and cover quickly, turn again as at first, and continue to do so about every two minutes until you have turned it about six or eight times. Have a hot buttered dish ready for it and lay it in; add a sprinkling of pepper, salt and sugar, and cover tightly. Now, if you wish a gravy, put a bit of butter in your pan. When hot, rub in a pinch of flour, add a small teacupful of boiling water, let it boil a few minutes, then put in a gravy boat instead of putting it over your beef to draw out the juice. Now try this plan just once, and you will see you women know nothing about cooking a good steak.—An Old Butcher.

A Terrible Experience.

Lucy—Maud, that was a terrible experience of yours!

Alice—Just think! You wake up and find the house on fire.

Julia—And you are carried down the ladder by a fireman!

Emma—In the presence of thousands of spectators!

Min—What did you have on?

Maud (sadly)—A wrapper and my bonnet.

All—Which bonnet?

Maud—Last season's—untrimmed.

All—Poor girl!

Exit Maud, weeping.—London Tid-Bits.

William Roberts, M. D. F. R. C. P., "Pregnancy is a fruitful cause of Bright's disease. The relative proportion of cases between the ages of 30 and 45, are 80 women to every 100 men, while after this period the mortality falls to 59 women to every 100 men." Women during pregnancy are especially liable to contract kidney disease, which if neglected will terminate in Bright's Disease. Keep the kidneys active, and maintain a healthy flow of urine by the frequent use of Warner's Safe Cure during the period of pregnancy. It will keep the kidneys healthy and active.

THE BREECHES BIBLE.

A Copy of the Rare Old Volume Owned in Hartford.

A well preserved volume of the genuine old "Breeches Bible," so called, is in the possession of Mr. Horace Johnson of Hartford. It was printed in London in 1602 in the old "black letter" text—enough to spoil the sights of any but the most persistent reader; but it was a kind of print with which Shakespeare and Lord Bacon were familiar. This edition—probably copied from the "Bishops' Bible" of 1568—derives its irreverent name from its version of the story of Adam and Eve in the garden. In chap. iii., v. 7, after telling of the transgression it reads:

7. Then the eyes of them both were opened, and they knew that they were naked; and they sewed fig tree leaves together, and made themselves breeches.

That picturesque attire is changed in King James' version, which appeared nine years later, to "aprons"—the present accepted version. King James' 54 translators only made alterations of the Tyndale and Coverdale text, and of the "Bishop's Bible" when it was found to be "necessary." The new revised version, however, makes a good many changes. It cost poor Tyndale his life—he was burnt at the stake, near Brussels, in 1536—for daring to make a translation into English.

This quaint old Bible includes those Old Testament books that have since been relegated to the nebulous limbo of "the Apocrypha," and includes them without any mark of separation from those that are now accepted. There are the books of Baruch, of Susannah, of Jesus the son of Sirach, the book of Maccabees, Esdras, Tobit, Bel and the Dragon, etc. all figuring as a part of the divinely inspired word. If we can believe the various holy councils on those subjects, more or less of these apocryphal books are not so inspired.

Mr. Johnson's old Bible contains also the quaint psalmody of Sternhold and Hopkins—the psalms of David "done into English verse."

The quaint character of the mechanical work alone of this old Bible makes it an interesting study to any one especially who knows much about printing. Unfortunately the quaint old title page is missing—its place being supplied by a pen and ink copy.—Hartford Times.

A Novel Refrigerator.

A young friend of mine who has for several years each summer gone with his father on a camping trip on the south shore of Lake Superior, tells me of a novel expedient they often employed for preserving their venison in warm weather. In that country some of the streams are dammed by long rows of sandhills, whose composition is so loose that they shift about continually under a wind of any force. In the winter time the high winds often blow the sand over the great snow banks which lie upon the north side of the sand hills, covering up the snow to a depth of several feet. The snow is thus kept unmelted and even in the middle of summer one can dig down through the sand to it and find the best imaginable sort of a natural refrigerator. In this way, said my young friend, they buried their deer and trout, and found them kept entirely fresh so long as they cared to leave them. This is certainly a new instance of nature's bountifulness with the sportsman.—Forest and Stream.

Continental Wages.

A stay-at-home man can have only a very vague idea of the position of England as compared with foreign countries. Especially he can have little idea how much levelling up has to be done with the wages of most continental workers. If we say that from a half to one-third of our wages is the rate over vast regions of the continent we should not be far wrong. They are excessively low in some districts of northern Italy, as on the plains below Vesuvius, where five shillings a week for a man is not uncommon, and the agricultural laborer of Bohemia is not much better off. The normal condition, almost everywhere, is so far below ours that it constitutes a danger to us and a cause for the migration of trades, which are always seeking the easiest and most profitable lines.

A traveller who during the last three years has travelled over 80,000 miles of various European countries declares that he has not once seen wages equal to those at Nottingham.—Manchester Textile Mercury.

Wine's Age from Electricity.

In the seventh annual State Viticultural Convention the subject of "the electromagnetic treatment of wines" was opened by Prof. Hilgard. He gave the history of the Fraser experiments, the results of which were that by the application of a current from a dynamo the acid and alcohol diminished and the age of the wine apparently increased. Various experiments had been made and the simplest arrived at was to place a quantity of wine in a glass jar and around the jar to wrap a coil of insulated wire and then apply a current of electricity. In the course of a few weeks he claimed that the acid and alcohol would combine in ether and leave the wine, making it smooth and pleasant to the palate. The process could not be used for tanks of wine, and the best form of vessel to use was still under investigation.—San Francisco Chronicle.

Idyllic Idleness.

Lady of the house—Why don't you go to work? I don't see what pleasure there can be in your sort of life, with nothing whatever in view.

Tramp—You're mistaken, madam. I have had something in view since the early spring, a work of the imagination, so to speak.

"Indeed! And what is that?"

"A summer idyll, as it were."

He Did.

Miss Clara (entertaining a caller)—Bobby, you mustn't play with Mr. Featherly's hat.

Bobby—Why not?

Miss Clara—You might injure it, and besides he will want it shortly.

It's odd how much food a horse can go without and still be no faster.

CURRENT TOPICS.

Some of our American exchanges are given to poking fun at the Britishers and the Queen every time Her Majesty telegraphs her sympathies to people or communities under the shadow of some great calamity, but it is now the Britishers turn to laugh if there is room for it. John Burns, the leader of the great London strike, says the American workingmen had forwarded sentiment and sympathy enough to become insolvent if committed to paper, but not a single cent to supply the wants of their fellow workmen.

It is an age of tremendous new surgical operations many of which have the peculiarity of appearing to be rather worse in themselves than the morbid conditions it is proposed to remedy by them. This, however, cannot be said of the operation that Dr. William Alexander proposes for the amelioration of epilepsy. In a bad case of epilepsy any conceivable remedy may fairly be regarded as worth a trial. Formerly Dr. Alexander used to put a ligature on the vertebral artery and that was not a minor operation. Now he proposes and practices the ligature of the superior cervical ganglion. His incision goes down by the external and internal jugular veins, and the sternal carotid artery has to be pushed aside to get at the ganglion. He has operated in twenty four cases and reports that six were cured, ten were improved, in five there was no change and two died.

Some very peculiar discoveries have been made during the progress of the Mackenzie Simpson work, but perhaps the most curious and to the mind of the most interesting was made recently. As the quarrymen on the Boston estate were lifting with a crane a block of stone weighing ten tons they were amazed to find a live frog in a small pool of water which had percolated through the red sandstone and settled in a cavity. Like the fly in amber the thing was neither rain nor rare and the wonder was how it got there. The frog was carefully tended and is now an object of curiosity. It was found on the 25th ult. and has changed color since exposure to the air. There is a film over its mouth. Its eyes also which are large are apparently sightless. How it has lived and grown in the prison home is somewhat of a mystery. A plaster cast has been taken of the cavity, and a photograph of the frog. It sat still whilst the operation was performed, and then jumped on to the floor.

Light in the Sick-room.

Still a custom prevails, despite all our sanitary teachings that the occupant of the sick-room in the private house should be kept at all hours in a darkened room. Not one time in ten do we enter a sick room in the daytime to find it blessed with the light of the sun. Almost invariably, before we can get a view at the face of the patient, we are obliged to request that the blinds may be drawn up, in order that the rays of a much greater healer than the most able physician can ever hope to be may be admitted. Too often the compliance with this request reveals a condition of room which, in a state of darkness, is almost inevitably one of disorder everywhere; books, magazines, furniture, bedding misplaced, dust and stray leavings in all directions.

In brief, there is nothing so bad as a dark sick room. It is as if the attendants were anticipating the death of the patient; and if the reason for it is asked, the answer is as inconsistent as the act. The reason usually offered is that the patient cannot bear the light, as though the light could not be cut off from the patient by a curtain or screen, and as though to darken one part of the room it were necessary to darken the whole of it. The real reason is an old superstitious practice, which once prevailed so intensely that the sick suffering from the most terrible diseases, small-pox, for instance, were shut up in darkness, their beds surrounded with red curtains, during the whole of their illness. The red curtains are now pretty nearly given up, but the darkness is still accredited with some mysterious curative virtue.

A more injurious practice really could not be maintained than that of darkness in the sick room. It is not only that dirt and disorder are results of darkness, a great remedy is lost. Sunlight is the remedy lost, and the less is momentous. Sunlight diffused through a room warms and clarifies the air. It has a direct influence on the minute organic poisons, a distinctive influence which is most precious, and it has a cheerful effect upon the mind. The sick should never be gloomy, and in the presence of light the shadows of gloom fly away. Happily the hospital ward, notwithstanding its many defects, and it has many, is so far favored that it is blessed with the light of the sun, whenever the sun shines. In private practice the same remedy ought to be extended to the patients of the household, and the first words of the physician or surgeon on entering the dark sick room should be the dying words of Goethe, "More light, more light!"—B. W. Richardson, M. D.

He "Hadn't Saw."

"Did you saw that wood I told you about?" asked the lady of the house of the tramp to whom she had given a dinner.

"Madam," he replied, and a look of contempt flitted across his tawny face, "I am surprised that so good a cook and housewife as you should be so ungrammatical. You should say, 'Did you see that wood?' 'Saw' is proper only in a question referring to the perfect tense. I cannot work for one so uncultured, for I fear I should be contaminated. Ta-ta."

Better Than a Safety Vault.

Highwayman (halting lady in carriage)—Stop, madam! Your money or your life!

Lady—My money is in my pocket, sir, and as neither you nor I can find it inside of ten minutes, and there is a large party of brethren tourists coming up the hill, I would advise you to let me pass.

Highwayman—Thanks, madam, your advice is worth heeding. Good day.

Too Expensive.

Jack—Edith, will you have me?

The Heiress—Thanks, Jack, I can't afford you.

A Boy's Trouble.

To the Editor of The Advance.

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—My Pa he takes your paper and he thinks an awful lot of it. He reads out of it all night sometimes cause he says it helps to educate us boys how to farm. A long time ago Pa read a piece that Zeke Bradshaw wrote and it made us boys laugh till we scairt the cat from under the cook stove. Pa he advised us boys (me and Jim and Pete) to take warnin' from the trouble that Zeke got into and not be monkeyin' around young fellers when they go to see their best girl, for it might make a separation and spoil their whole lives after. He talked to us like a preacher and Sarah (thats my big sister) she said it was gettin awful warm in the room and she opened the door. I guess she wanted to change the subject for she has a feller what comes to see her sometimes, he don't come now like he used to though. He is a great big tall chap and he has got long feet. Pete he asked him one day when he was scrapin the mud off what made his feet so long and he said he got too much bent up. I guess it was well he did have so much bent for if he'd been any higher it would have been hard for him to whisper to Sarah when he was walking home from church Sunday nights with me and her. He used to call me his little man but he don't any more cause one night he came to our house and Sarah she took him in the parlor and told us boys she'd give us some cookies when she baked again if we'd be good boys and go to bed, so we went upstairs to our room and Pete and me laid down on our bed and I laid right down on our big kitten cause it was dark and we could nt see him. He was all curled up in a heap and I felt awful sorry and rubbed him up the back to see him spark.

Our room is right over the parlor and there's a stove pipe hole where the pipe comes up when the stove is there. The hole was covered with a mat, and Jim he was prowling around and pulled the mat off the hole and looked down. He saw Feet. We always call him Feet now cause we don't like him. He was right under the stove pipe hole on the sofa, holdin Sarah like as if she'd fall to pieces if he'd leave her go. Jim, he whispered to me and Pete to come and look, so we went and I took the kitten cause I did'nt want him to get away. Pete looked first and then I looked and Jim whispered to me to let kittie see, so I held him over and Jim he hit my hands and knocked poor kittie down through the hole. I could'nt hold him cause he scratched. We heard a big noise down stairs. Sarah she screamed awful, and Feet ran to the parlor door and we heard Pa meet him and ask him what was the matter. He said something about them uncultivated imps of his throwin cats on his head so Pa said he'd tend to them for it cause he liked Feet, and did'nt want us boys to play any tricks on him. So he started to stamp up stairs and Pete and Jim and me crawled into bed and covered our heads with the quilts. We did'nt stay there long for Pa rolled us out quilts and all and took a bed slat. Jim and Pete crawled off in a dark corner but I got tangled in the quilts and Pa caught me. I tried to tell him I did'nt do it but he could'nt hear for the noise of the slat. He found Jim and Pete and he talked to them just like he did to me and then he made us sleep in the closet all night. Feet did nt come back again for a long time and Sarah felt awful bad, but when he did come again Pa and Sarah used him awful nice, so I guess he got over being mad. Jim says he don't see what he got mad for anyhow. Pa always tells us boys when any bad accident happens, to feel pleasant and be thankful that it was'nt worse and I think Feet ought to feel glad that we did'nt let the kitten scratch his eyes out. I don't know what Pa will say when he reads this, but I'm going to grandpa's for two weeks and I gave Jim my best fish line and Pete my popgun if they'd take their oath on the Almanac that they would'nt tell Pa that I wrote it.

Yours Truly,
JOSIAH GREEN.

A GREAT DEMONSTRATION

A great Liberal demonstration [illegible] was that [illegible] Horner [illegible] Monday evening last. It was gotten up by the Liberals of Toronto with a view to bringing into line the refractory members of their party. Hon. Wilfrid Laurier and Hon. Oliver Mowat were the big guns brought into play for the occasion, and how [illegible] leader in the Dominion Parliament. [illegible]

[illegible]

It has never had a stable platform, and to-day, by the dictate of the Liberal leader, it has committed itself unequivocally to the one narrow and visionary plank of Commercial Union, and, in the words of Mr. Laurier, the Liberal party, so long as he has anything to do with it, must remain true to the policy of unrestricted reciprocity. We consider it as a very rash decision, inasmuch as Mr. Laurier is a comparatively young man, and in the event of his [illegible] as leader of the opposition [illegible]

[illegible]

The manner in which Mr. Laurier entered upon his duty made it plain that he was cognizant of the hazardous task before him, and one cannot but admire his temerity in facing an Ontario audience in the manner in which he did, with convictions entirely at variance with those of the great majority of his hearers. He received, too, a fair hearing. His sentiments were listened to with respect, and his arguments received with a courteous hearing which augured well for a final peaceful quietus to the Jesuit Estate question. We have only space to quote one of his telling points on this question. After impressing upon his hearers by his own statement and documentary proof that it had not been the desire of the Quebec legislature to place Pope before Queen, Mr. Laurier [illegible]

[illegible]

This is a very satisfactory answer, too, but this [illegible] fact that Protestants [illegible] a treasonable act had been committed. When they find out their mistake the matter will be gratefully [illegible]

The Water Lily.

The summer morning opens cool,
A subtle freshness fills the air;
And see! upon the cloistered pool,
The lily opes her bosom there.

Of all the buds and blossoms rare,
No fairer one the eye may bless;
She feels the zephyr's kindly care,
And trembles at his fond caress.

Through all the loathsome mud and slime
She sends her rootlets to search below,
And undreamed beauties upward climb,
And in her petals throb and glow.

Send down thy rootlets, O my soul!
With darkened lives thy sunlight share,
And seek in miry depth and shoal
God's beauteous image buried there.

So, in some fair, diviner hour,
When risen free from sin and crime,
Thou shalt preserve life's perfect power
Above the sluggish pools of time.

The Rain Harp.

When out of doors is full of rain
I look out through the window pane,
And see the branches of the trees,
Like people dancing to the breeze.

They bow politely, cross and meet,
Salute their partners and retreat,
And never stop to rest until
They reach the end of the quadrille.

I listen, and I hear the sound
Of music floating all around,
And fancy 'tis the breeze who plays
Upon the harp on stormy days.

The strings are made of rain, and when
The branches wish to dance again,
They whisper to the breeze, and he Begins another melody.

I've heard him play the pretty things
Upon those slender, shining strings;
And when he's done—he's very sharp—
He always hides away the harp.

AN AMERICAN GIRL.

This comparatively tame version was, however, entirely discarded when the diamonds and silver mines began to figure more largely in the reports. Certainly, pretty, overdressed, jewel bedecked Octavia gave Slowbridge abundant cause for excitement.

After leaving her, Lady Theobald drove home to Oldclough Hall, rather out of humor. She had been rather out of humor for some time, having never quite recovered from her anger at the daring of that cheerful builder of mills, Mr. John Burmistone. Mr. Burmistone had been one innovation, and Octavia Bassett was another. She had not been able to manage Mr Burmistone, and she was not at all sure that she had managed Octavia Bassett.

She entered the diningroom with an ominous frown on her forehead.

At the end of the table, opposite her own seat, was a vacant chair, and her frown deepened when she saw it.

"Where is Miss Gaston?" she demanded of the servant.

Before the man had time to reply, the door opened, and a girl came in hurriedly, with a somewhat frightened air.

"I beg pardon, grandmamma, dear," she said, going to her seat quickly. "I did not know you had come home."

"We have a dinner hour," announced her ladyship, "and I do not disregard it."

"I am very sorry," faltered the culprit.

"That is enough, Lucia," interrupted Lady Theobald; and Lucia dropped her eyes, and began to eat her soup with nervous haste. In fact, she was glad to escape so easily.

She was a very pretty creature, with brown eyes, a soft, white skin, and a slight figure with a reed like grace. A great quantity of brown hair was twisted into an ugly coil on the top of her delicate little head, and she wore an ugly muslin gown of Miss Chickie's make.

For some time the meal progressed in dead silence, but at length Lucia ventured to raise her eyes.

"I have been walking in Slowbridge, grandmamma," she said, "and I met Mr. Burmistone, who told me that Miss Bassett had a visitor—a young lady from America."

Lady Theobald laid her knife and fork down deliberately.

"Mr. Burmistone?" she said. "Did I understand you to say that you stopped on the road-side to converse with Mr. Burmistone?"

Lucia colored up to her delicate eyebrows and above them.

"I was trying to reach a flower growing on the bank," she said, "and he was so kind as to stop to get it for me. I did not know he was near at first. And then he inquired how you were—and told me he had just heard about the young lady."

"Naturally!" remarked her ladyship, sardonically. "It is as I anticipated it would be. We shall find Mr. Burmistone at our elbows on all occasions. And he will not allow himself to be easily driven away. He is as determined as persons of his class usually are."

"Oh, grandmamma?" protested Lucia, with innocent fervor. "I really do not think he is—like that at all. I could not help thinking he was very gentlemanly and kind. He is so interested in your school, and so anxious that it should prosper."

"May I ask," inquired Lady Theobald, "how long a time this generous expression of his sentiments occupied? Was this the reason of your forgetting the dinner-hour?"

"We did not—" said Lucia, guiltily; "it did not take many minutes. I—I do not think that made me late."

Lady Theobald dismissed this paltry excuse with one remark—a remark made in the deep tones referred to once before.

"I should scarcely have expected," she observed, "that a granddaughter of mine would have spent half an hour conversing on the public road with the proprietor of Slowbridge Mills.'

"Oh, grandmamma!" exclaimed Lucia, the tears rising in her eyes; "it was not half an hour."

"I should scarcely have expected," replied her ladyship, "that a granddaughter of mine would have spent five minutes conversing on the public road with the proprietor of Slowbridge Mills."

To this assault there seemed to be no reply to make. Lady Theobald had her granddaughter under excellent control. Under her rigorous rule, the girl—whose mother had died at her birth—had been brought up. At nineteen she was simple, sensitive, shy. She had been permitted to have no companions, and the greatest excitements of her life had been the Slowbridge tea-parties. Of the late Sir Gilbert Theobald, the less said the better. He spent very little of his married life at Oldclough Hall, and, upon his death, his widow had found herself possessed of a substantial, gloomy mansion, and exalted position in Slowbridge society, and a small marriage settlement, upon which she might make all the efforts she chose to sustain her state. So Lucia wore her dresses a much longer time than any other Slowbridge young lady; she was obliged to mend her little gloves again and again; and her hats were retrimmed so often that even Slowbridge thought them old-fashioned. But she was too simple and sweet-natured to be much troubled, and indeed thought very little about the matter. She was only troubled when Lady Theobald scolded her, which was by no means infrequently. Perhaps the straits to which, at times, her ladyship was put to maintain her dignity embittered her somewhat.

"Lucia is neither a Theobald nor a Barold," she had been heard to say once, and she had said it with much rigor.

A subject of much conversation in private circles had been Lucia's future. It had been discussed in whispers since her seventeenth year, but no one had seemed to approach any solution of the difficulty. Upon the subject of her plans for her granddaughter, Lady Theobald had preserved stern silence. Once, and once only, she had allowed herself to be betrayed into the expression of a sentiment connected with the matter.

"If Miss Lucia marries—" a matron of reckless proclivities had remarked.

Lady Theobald turned upon her, slowly and majestically.

"If Miss Gaston marries," she repeated. "Does it seem likely that Miss Gaston will not marry?"

This settled the matter finally. Lucia was to be married when Lady Theobald thought fit. So far, however, she had not thought fit—indeed, there had been nobody for Lucia to marry—nobody whom her grandmother would have allowed her to marry, at least. There were very few young gentlemen in Slowbridge, and the very few were scarcely eligible according to Lady Theobald's standard and—if such a thing should be mentioned—to Lucia's, if she had known she had one, which she certainly did not.

CHAPTER VI.

ACCIDENTAL.

When dinner was over, Lady Theobald rose, and proceeded to the drawing-room, Lucia following in her wake. From her very babyhood, Lucia had disliked the drawing-room, which was an imposing apartment of great length and height, containing much massive furniture, upholstered in faded blue satin. All the girl's evenings, since her fifth year, had been spent sitting opposite her grandmother, in one of the straightest of the blue chairs; all the most scathing reproofs she had received had been administered to her at such times. She had a secret theory, indeed, that all unpleasant things occurred in the drawing-room after dinner.

Just as they had seated themselves, and Lady Theobald was on the point of drawing towards her the little basket, containing the grey woollen mittens she made a duty of employing herself by knitting each evening, Dobson, the coachman, in his character of footman, threw open the door, and announced a visitor.

"Captain Barold."

Lady Theobald dropped her grey mitten, the steel needles falling upon the table with a clink. She rose to her feet at once, and met half way the young man who had entered.

"My dear Francis," she remarked, "I am exceedingly glad to see you at last," with a slight emphasis upon the "at last."

"Thanks," said Captain Barold, rather languidly. "You're very good, I'm sure."

Then he glanced at Lucia, and Lady Theobald addressed her.

"Lucia," she said, "this is Francis Barold, who is your cousin."

Captain Barold shook hands feebly.

"I have been trying to find out whether it is third or fourth," he said.

"It is third," said my lady.

Lucia had never seen her display such cordiality to anybody. But Captain Francis Barold did not seem much impressed by it. It struck Lucia that he would not be likely to be impressed by anything. He seated himself near her grandmother's chair, and proceeded to explain his presence on the spot, without exhibiting much interest even in his own relation of facts.

"I promised the Ruthburns that I would spend a week at their place; and Slowbridge was on the way, so it occurred to me I would drop off in passing. The Ruthburn's place, Broadoaks, is about ten miles further on; not far, you see.

"Then," said Lady Theobald, "I am to understand that your visit is accidental."

Captain Barold was not embarrassed. He did not attempt to avoid her ladyship's rather stern eye, as he made his cool reply.

"Well, yes," he said. "I beg pardon, but it is accidental rather."

Lucia gave him a pretty, frightened look, as if she felt that, after such an audacious confession, some thing very serious must happen; but nothing serious happened at all. Singularly enough, it was Lady Theobald herself who looked ill at ease, and as though she had not been prepared for such a contingency.

During the whole of the evening, in fact, it was always Lady Theobald who was placed at a disadvantage, Lucia discovered. She could hardly realize the fact, at first; but before an hour had passed, its truth was forced upon her.

Captain Barold was a very striking-looking man upon the whole. He was large, gracefully built, and fair, his eyes were grey, and noticeable for the coldness of their expression, his features regular and aquiline, his movements leisurely.

As he conversed with her grandmother, Lucia wondered at him privately. It seemed to her innocent mind that he had been everywhere, and seen everything and everybody, without caring for or enjoying his privileges. The truth was that he had seen and experienced a great deal too much. As an only child, the heir to a large property, and heir prospective to one of the oldest titles in the country, he had exhausted life early. He saw in Lady Theobald, not the imposing head and social front of Slowbridge social life, the power who rewarded with approval and punished with a frown, but a tiresome, pretentious old woman, whom his mother had asked him, for some feminine reason, to visit.

"She feels she has a claim upon us, Francis," she had said, appealingly.

"Well," he had remarked, "that is rathed dueced cool, isn't it? We have people enough on our hands without cultivating Slowbridge, you know."

His mother sighed faintly.

"It is true we have a great many people to consider, but I wish you would do it, my dear."

She did not say anything about Lucia; above all, she did not mention that a year ago she herself had spent two or three days at Slowbridge, and had been charmed beyond measure by the girl's innocent freshness, and that she had said, rather absently, to Lady Theobald:

"What a charming wife Lucia would make for a man to whom gentleness and a yielding disposition were necessary! We do not find such girls in society nowadays, my dear Lady Theobald. It is very difficult of late years to find a girl who is not spoken of as 'fast,' and who is not disposed to take the reins in her own hands. Our young men are flattered and courted until they become a little dictatorial, and our girls are spoiled at home. And the result is a great deal of domestic unhappiness afterward—and even a great deal of scandal, which is dreadful to contemplate. I cannot help feeling the greatest anxiety in secret concerning Francis. Young men so seldom consider these matters until it is too late."

"Girls are not trained as they were in my young days, or even in yours," said Lady Theobald. "They are allowed too much liberty. Lucia has been brought up immediately under my own eye."

"I feel that it is fortunate," remarked Mrs. Barold, quite incidentally, "that Francis need not make a point for money."

For a few moments lady Theobald did not respond; but afterward, in the course of the conversation which followed, she made an observation which was, of course purely incidental:

"If Lucia makes a marriage which pleases her great-uncle, old Mr. Dugald Binnie, of Glasgow, she will be a very fortunate girl. He has intimated, in his eccentric fashion, that his immense fortune will either be hers or will be spent in building charitable asylums of various kinds. He is a remarkable and singular man."

When Captain Barold had entered his distinguished relative's drawing-room, he had not regarded his third cousin with a very great deal of interest. He had seen too many beauties in his thirty years to be greatly moved by the sight of one; and here was only a girl who had soft eyes, and looked young for her age, and who wore an ugly muslin gown, that most girls could not have carried off at all.

"You have spent the greater part of your life in Slowbridge?" he condescended to say, in the course of the evening.

"I have lived here always," Lucia answered. "I have never been away more than a week at a time,"

"Ah?" interrogatively. "I hope you have not found it dull."

"No," smiling a little. "Not very. You see, I have known nothing gayer."

"There is society enough of a harmless kind here," spoke up Lady Theobald, virtuously. "I do not approve of a round of gayeties for young people; it unfits them for the duties of life."

But Captain Barold was not as favourably impressed by the remarks as might have been anticipated.

"What an old fool she is!" was his polite inward comment. And he resolved at once to make his visit as brief as possible, and not to be induced to run down again, during his stay at Broadoaks. He did not even take the trouble to appear to enjoy his evening. From his earliest infancy, he had always found it easier to please himself than to please other people. In fact, the world had devoted itself to endeavoring to please him, and win his—toleration, we may say, instead of admiration, since it could not hope for the latter. At home he had been adored rapturously by a large circle of affectionate male and female relatives; at school, his tutors had been singularly indulgent of his faults and admiring of his talents; even among his fellow pupils he had been a sort of autocrat. Why not, indeed, with such birthrights and such prospects? When he had entered society, he had met with even more amiable treatment from affectionate mothers, from innocent daughters, from cordial paternal parents, who had voted him an exceedingly fine fellow. Why should he bore himself by taking the trouble to seem pleased by a stupid evening with an old grenadier in petticoats, and a badly dressed country girl?

Lucia was very glad when, in answer to a timidly appealing glance, Lady Theobald said:

"It is half-past ten. You may wish us good-night, Lucia."

Lucia obeyed, as if she had been half-past 10 herself, instead of nearly 20; and Barold was not long in following her example.

Dobson led him to a stately chamber at the top of the staircase, and left him there. The captain chose the largest and most luxurious chair, sat down in it and lighted a cigar at his leisure.

"Confoundedly stupid hole!" he said, with a refined vigor one would scarcely have expected from an individual of his birth and breeding. "I shall leave to-morrow, of course. What was my mother thinking of? Stupid business from first to last."

CHAPTER VII.

"I SHOULD LIKE TO SEE MORE OF SLOWBRIDGE."

When he announced at breakfast his intention of taking his departure on the midday train Lucia wondered again what would happen, and again, to her relief, Lady Theobald was astonishingly lenient.

"As your friends expect you of course we cannot overrule them," she said. "We will, however, hope to see something of you during your stay at Broadoaks. It will be very easy for you to run down and give us a few hours now and then."

"Thanks!" said Captain Barold.

He was decently civil, if not enthusiastic, during the few remaining hours of his stay. He sauntered through the grounds with Lucia, who took charge of him, in obedience to her grandmother's wish. He did not find her particularly troublesome when she was away from her ladyship's side. When she came out to him in her simple cotton gown and straw hat, it occurred to him that she was much prettier than he had thought her at first. For economical reasons, she had made the little morning-dress herself, without the slightest regard for the designs of Miss Chickie, and, as it was not trimmed at all and had only a black velvet ribbon at the waist, there was nothing to place her charming figure at a disadvantage. It could not be said that her shyness and simplicity delighted Captain Barold; but, at least, they did not displease him, and this was really as much as could be expected.

"She does not expect a fellow to exert himself, at all events," was his inward comment, and he did not exert himself.

But when on the point of taking his departure he went so far as to make a very gracious remark to her.

"I hope we shall have the pleasure of seeing you in London for a season, before very long," he said. "My mother wil have great pleasure in taking charge of you, if Lady Theobald cannot be induced to leave Slowbridge."

"Lucia never goes from home alone," said Lady Theobald; "but I should certainly be obliged to called upon your mother for her good offices, in the case of our spending a season in London. I am too old a woman to alter my mode of life altogether.

In obedience to her ladyship's orders, the venerable landau was brought to the door, and the two ladies drove to the station with him.

A curious incident occurred—an incident to which, perhaps, this story owes its existence, since, if it had not taken place, there might, very possibly, have been no events of a stirring nature to chronicle. Just as Dobson drove rather slowly up the part of High street distinguished by the presence of Miss Belinda Bassett's house, Captain Barold suddenly appeared to be attracted by some figure he discovered in the garden appertaining to that modest structure.

"By Jove!" he exclaimed in an under tone, "there is Miss Octavia."

For the moment he was almost roused to a display of interest. A faint smile lighted his face, and his cold handsome eyes slightly brightened.

Lady Theobald sat bolt upright.

"That is Miss Bassett's niece, from America," she said, "do I understand you know her?"

Captain Barold turned to confront her, evidently annoyed at having allowed a surprise to get the better of him. All the expression died out of his face.

"I travelled with her from Framwich to Stamford," he said. "I suppose we should have reached Slowbridge together, but that I dropped off at Stamford to get a newspaper, and the train left me behind."

"Oh, grandmamma!" exclaimed Lucia, who had turned to look, "how very pretty she is!"

Miss Octavia certainly was amazingly so this morning. She was standing by a rose-bush again, and was dressed in a cashmere morning-robe of the finest texture and the faintest pink; it had a Watteau plait down the back, a jabot of lace down the front, and the close, high frills of lace around the throat which seemed to be a weakness with her. Her hair was dressed high upon her head, and showed to advantage her little ears and as much of her slim, white neck as the frills did not conceal.

But Lady Theobald did not share Lucia's enthusiasm.

"She looks like an actress," she said. "If the trees were painted canvas and the roses artifical, one might have some patience with her. That kind of thing is scarcely what we expect in Slowbridge."

Then she turned to Barold.

"I had the pleasure of meeting her yesterday, not long after she arrived," she said. "She had diamonds in her ears as big as peas, and rings to match. Her manner is just what one might expect from a young woman brought up among gold-diggers and silver-miners."

"It struck me as being a very unique and interesting manner," said Captain Barold. "It is chiefly noticeable for a sang froid which might be regarded as rather enviable. She was good enough to tell me all about her papa and the silver mines, and I really found the conversation entertaining."

"It is scarcely customary for English young women to confide in their masculine travelling companions to such an extent," remarked my lady grimly.

"She did not confide in me at all," said Barold. "Therein lay her attraction. One cannot submit to being 'confided in' by a strange young woman, however charming. This young lady's remarkes were flavored solely with an adorably cool candor. She evidently did not desire to appeal to any emotion whatever."

And, as he leaned back in his seat, he still looked at the picturesque figure which they had passed, as if he would not have been sorry to see it turn its head toward him.

In fact, it seemed that, notwithstanding his usual good fortune, Captain Barold was doomed this morning to make remarks of a nature objectionable to his revered relation. On their way they passed Mr. Burmistone's mill, which was at work in all its vigor, with a whir and buzz of machinery and a slight odor of oil in its surrounding atmosphere.

"Ah!" said Mr. Barold, putting his single eye-glass into his eye, and scanning it after the manner of experts. "I did not think you had anything of that sort here. Who put it up?"

"The man's name," replied Lady Theobald, severely, "is Burmistone."

"Pretty good idea, isn't it?" remarked Barold. "Good for the place—and all that sort of thing."

"To my mind," answered my lady, "it is the worst thing which could have happened."

Mr. Francis Barold dropped his eye-glass dexterously, and at once lapsed into his normal condition—which was a condition by no means favorable to argument.

"Think so?" he said slowly. "Pity isn't it under the circumstances?"

And really there was nothing at all for her ladyship to do but preserve a lofty silence. She had scarcely recovered herself when they reached the station, and it was necessary to say farewell as complacently as possible.

"We will hope to see you again before many days," she said, with dignity, if not with warmth.

Mr. Francis Barold was silent for a secon, and a slightly reflective expression flitted across his face.

"Thanks—yes," he said at last. "Certainly. It is easy to come down, and I should like to see more of Slowbridge."

When the train had puffed in and out of the station, and Dobson was driving down High street again, her ladyship's feelings rather got the better of her.

"If Belinda Bassett is a wise woman," she remarked, "she will take my advice, and get rid of this young lady as soon as possible. It appears to me," she continued, with exalted piety, "that every well-trained English girl has reason to thank her Maker that she was born in a civilized land."

"Perhaps," suggested Lucia, softly, "Miss Octavia Bassett has had no one to to train her at all—and it may be that—that she even feels it deeply."

The feathers in her ladyship's bonnet trembled.

"She does not feel it at all!" she announced. "She is an impertinent—minx!"

A Man of Understanding.

America's champion "Big Foot John" has been unearthed in the wilds of North Carolina, and he has his shoes made in this city. He is a divine and a gentleman of color, being properly known as the Rev. John W. Farnham, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Charlotte. The size of his boot is 35½, which necessitates a sole of twenty inches in length and seven inches broad. Rev. Farnham stands 6 feet 10 inches in his sizable stockings and weighs 410 pounds when stripped of his impedimenta. When he strides up the sanctuary aisle the foundations rumble as if under the influence of an earthquake shock, and the stranger within the gates jerks round expecting to see Gabriel and the Last Day hand in hand. The enforced itinerancy of Methodistic clergyman has caused Brother Farnham no little annoyance, for no sooner does he find in one town a cobbler who can fit his feet than he is hustled off to another far distant. Recently, however, the problem has found a solution. The dominie has had a quantity of mammoth lasts and uppers, sufficient to last till doomsday, manufactured and sent to a shoe house on Eighth street, in this city. Thus provided he can rise superior to his big-footed fate by having the finishing touches added whenever there is need. The privilege of half-soling the reverend's boots is counted a rare one.—Philadelphia Record.

Scottish Mining Casualties.

Taking Scotland as a whole there were comparatively few fatal accidents in mines last year, although the total number of accidents of all kinds show a considerable increase over the previous year, namely, 200, as against 167. In 35 of these 200 accidents 36 persons were killed, as against 27 deaths by 27 separate accidents in 1887. Although that is a considerable increase yet it is very much under the average since the passing of the Mines Regulation Act of 1872. The average lives lost annually during the sixteen years is one in every 586 persons employed, while last year it was only one in every 626. No less than 53⅓ per cent. of the deaths last year were caused by falls—four falls of coal and twelve falls from the roof resulting in seventeen deaths. As regards these falls Mr. Ronaldson says: "I can only repeat what I have stated in former reports, that until there is introduced compulsory systematic propping and spragging at the face, which leaves nothing to individual discretion as to where and when props and sprags are to be set, progress in reducing the number of these accidents will be slow." Mr. Moore again says that he thinks the minimum of accidents from falls from the roofs and sides will never be reached until the care of the roof and sides of the miners' working places in put upon the owners and officials with no power to delegate it to the miner, and he adds that, in his opinion, "there ought to be a trained staff of men for this class of work."

A Trinidad Mutiny Suppressed.

A New York despatch says: Advices from Bolivia state that a mutiny occurred some time ago in Trinidad, the capital of the Beni Department. The revolting troops were joined by the citizens, and they offered a stubborn resistance for some hours. The mutineers surrendered after the loss of twenty-four of their number. Of the attacking force eleven were killed or wounded.

Scared Away the Cat.

"What a lot of bright ideas you have!" exclaimed the young wife admiringly to her husband.

"But I haven't such bright eyes, dear, as you!" exclaimed the young husband to his wife.

And then the family cat got up disgusted from her warm resting place by the sitting-room stove and walked solemnly and slowly out into the open air.

What a Brute!

Stupid Man—I've hired a new typewriter.

Wife (coldly)—Indeed!

Stupid Man (enthusiastically)—Yes, a daisy. One of the kind you can take anywhere with you and hold on your lap and ——.

FOR YOUNG CANADIANS.

History in Brief—Official Acts Leading Up to Confederation.

In 1808, the question of Union of the British Provinces of North America was brought before the Legislature of Nova Scotia by Richard J. Uniacke.

In 1814 Chief Justice Sewell, of Quebec, proposed to Lord Bathurst the solution of certain Governmental difficulties of the time by the formation of a union of British North American colonies.

In 1822, John Beverly Robinson, Attorney-General for Upper Canada, formed a plan for the Confederation of British North America.

In 1825, Mr. McCullogh, then publisher of the Montreal Free Press, strongly supported a similar scheme, and in 1835, Robert Gourlay, in London, submitted a plan of the same nature.

In 1839, Lord Durham, in his report to the British Government, recommended that the provinces be confederated.

In 1854, Hon. J. W. Johnston placed a resolution favoring confederation before the Nova Scotia Legislature.

In 1857, the same gentleman and the Hon. A. G. Archibald went to England as delegates from the Nova Scotia Legislature to secure the attention of the British authorities for the scheme.

In 1857, Hon. A. T. Galt is said to have alluded favorably to the plan, and the same year he, with the Hon. G. E. Cartier and Hon. John Rose, being in England on business concerning the colonies, discussed the proposal for union with Sir Bulwer Lytton, then Colonial Secretary.

In 1861, the first legislative step was taken by Nova Scotia, the Assembly there having unanimously resolved in favor of a Confederation.

In June, 1864, the Hon. George Brown, then Chairman of a Select Committee of the Canadian Legislature, made a report favoring a federation to be applied either to Canada alone or to all the Provinces of British North America.

In September of the same year the Charlottetown Conference was held to discuss a Maritime union of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. Delegates from Canada asked permission to attend, and upon it being granted proposed the larger union to the conference on the 12th of September.

On the 10th of October, 1864, the celebrated Quebec Conference was held, at which delegates from Canada, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland attended, and the famous Quebec resolutions, the basis of the present Confederation were framed in seventeen days.

On the 3rd of February, 1865, the Canadian Parliament met at Quebec, and the Quebec resolutions were introduced. They were placed before the House of Assembly by Hon. John A. Macdonald, and before the Legislative Council by Hon. E. P. Tache. The motion approving of them was carried by a large majority.

On the 24th of April, 1865, New Brunswick having returned a House opposed to Confederation, Hon Charles Tupper carried a motion in the Nova Scotia Legislature favoring the renewal of negotiations for a maritime union.

On the 17th of April, 1866, Mr. Tupper moved a resolution in the Nova Scotia Legislature empowering the Lieutenant Governor to appoint delegates who would confer with the Imperial Government and make arrangements for the entry of the Province into Confederation in such a way that its interests would be protected. The resolution was carried, and on the 30th of June, 1866, a like resolution applying to New Brunswick was carried in the Legislature of that Province.

On the 4th of December, 1866, deputations from the two Provinces of Canada, and from New Brunswick and Nova Scotia met in London, and organized the London Conference at which the question was discussed with her Majesty's legal officers, the interviews beginning on the 24th of Jan., 1867.

The Act of Union was made law by the Imperial Parliament on the 29th of March, 1867, and on the 22nd of May the Royal Proclamation was issued from Windsor Castle.

On the 1st of July, 1867, Confederation was proclaimed through the four Provinces, and the Dominion of Canada was an accomplished fact.

On the 23rd of June, 1870, Rupert's Land and the Northwest Territory were, upon the joint addresses of the Dominion Houses of Parliament admitted to Confederation by an Imperial Order-in-Council.

On the 15th of July, 1870, Manitoba became a Province in the Union.

On the 20th of July, 1871, British Columbia was added.

On the 1st of July, 1873, Prince Edward Island joined in the swim.

The Warmth of Italian Courtship

All court circles delight in gossip, and nowhere is more material furnished than in Italy. Italians think of nothing else but making love. Flirtation is unknown; it is always desperate earnest there. The chaperon is a necessity. Women speak of their lovers with a frankness that would amaze us here. In the family circle, at dinner, in the presence of the children, subjects are discussed and stories told that would never be mentioned even in private with us. If Mrs. Chamberlain finds it necessary to seek a retreat from polite drawing-rooms in London she would fly quickly from Rome.—Buffalo News.

A Hint to the Fraternity.

First Country Editor—How are you coming on with your paper?

Second Country Editor—First rate. Got seventy-five subscribers last week.

Do they pay up.

You bet they do.

How do you manage to make them pay?

I issue phrenological charts to every subscriber, and those who pay in advance have finely developed heads. It's a great scheme.

Kindness Appreciated.

Old Lady—Doctor, please let me have my bill.

Doctor—My good woman, I know you are not in the best of circumstances. I want nothing for my trouble.

Old Lady—Oh, that's kind of you! But who will pay the druggist?

—Lady of the house to tramp—You eat as if you never had seen a meal of victuals before! Tramp—Madam, you must excuse me. I s'pose I do eat awkward, but the fact is I hain't had much practice lately.

THE ALLEGED DAY MURDER.

Probability That it Will Turn Out to be a Huge Hoax.

The Day murder case, says Thursday's Recorder, which for a few days past has been greatly agitating many people in the back country and for which one Carr is now in Brockville jail awaiting his trial, is likely to turn out the biggest kind of a farce from beginning to end. As was intimated in yesterday's issue, two men interested in the affair crossed the river here in search of the old house in which Day's body was said to have been placed after he had met death at Carr's hands. They were accompanied by the little boy who first gave the particulars of the murder and upon whose story the whole case originated and rested. The youngster is said to be an illegitimate son of the accused man's brother, his mother being Mrs. Rebecca Day, wife of the man said to have been murdered. He is a barefooted urchin about 10 years old, sharp as a steel trap in his movements and talk and, as the sequel will show, possesses all the essential requisites for a first-class book agent or a lightning rod pedler. Robert Day, brother of the missing man, is the party who headed the search for the old house yesterday, and he seems a modest and much-in-earnest countryman. He stated on his return home that after they crossed the river they proceeded out on what is known as the Oswegatchie road from Morristown to a point about midway between that village and Ogdensburg. They had no difficulty in finding the old house described, and soon came upon a farmer who resided in the immediate vicinity. When this personage was told the story he gave it as his opinion that no body would be found in the cellar, for the reason that in the first place the house had no cellar and in the second place the expected corpse was earning good wages in the employ of a farmer about a mile further down the road. Sure enough a visit to this place revealed Day, who not only is earning a good living, but also satisfied with his lot. The residents in that section, however, knew the whole lot of Days and Carrs and were not at all sorry when they left the country. One of them said that Carr had threatened to take Day's life and always carried a butcher knife on his person. Robert Day now says that Carr will be held on several other counts, including stealing. The boy has been treated to quite an excursion and now says that he was instructed by his mother to tell the story and that there was no truth in it.

British Crops.

The weather has been so bad for the greater part of the month that has elapsed since harvest began that the quality, and to some extent the quantity, of the grain must have suffered. Some wheat has sprouted, but not very much. Barley has been badly stained, so that fine malting samples will be scarce. The wheat crop is still generally estimated at about 80,000,000 bushels or a little under, but it will surely be safe to reckon on 73,000,000 bushels, after allowing for seed, other farm uses and waste owing to damage done by the rains. Probably about 68,000,000 bushels will be all that will be marketable, and in that case we shall require to import during the next twelve months about 140,000,000 bushels.

The hop crop is nearly all gathered, and it has been but little injured by the rain. Indeed, except for hops bruised by high winds, the quality is exceptionally fine. The yield is now generally put at about 8 cwts. per acre, which, on the 57,754 acres grown, will come to 462,032 cwts. Last week the weather was brilliantly fine, enabling many farmers to stack their crops of grain in dry condition. But harvest is not half over in the late districts, and unfortunately we have had more rain this week. Most of the new wheat brought to market has been damp; but dry samples weigh well, some as much as 63 pounds per measured bushel. This is a good sign, and it may be that the yield will prove beyond expectations.

The British Warship Lily Lost.

A St. John's, Nfld., despatch of Friday night says: The British war ship Lily struck a rock off Point Armor and sank. Seven of her crew were lost. The vessel is a total wreck. Considerable money and valuables went down with her. Nothing was saved. The Lily was a composite gunboat of 720 tons burthen and 830 horse-power and carried three guns. She belonged to the North American and West Indies station.

A British Steamer Wrecked.

A Baldwin, L. I., despatch of Tuesday says: The British steamer Vertumnus, of the New York and Jamica steamship line, ran ashore last night in a dense fog opposite the life-saving station at Point Lookout. She had a cargo of fruit, most of which was thrown overboard. Four passengers and the crew of eighteen were taken off safely. The vessel is being badly pounded by the waves and the chances of floating her are poor.

The case of the Queen vs. Marshall C. Twitchell came up for trial at Kingston yesterday. The defendant was present in court and desired to alter the tribunal and to be tried by a jury instead of the Judge. The Judge allowed him to elect to be tried by a jury and granted the application for a postponement of the trial till next assizes. Bail was granted and the defendant was again liberated.

A HUSBAND'S AGONY.

He Strives in Vain to Save His Wife from Death.

The New York Herald of Thursday says: Mr. and Mrs. McHugh lived in cosy rooms on the third floor of No. 427, which is a big tenement house. Daniel is a laborer. He was obliged to be up early to reach his work on time, and Mrs. McHugh usually rose first, lighted the fire and prepared his breakfast while he finished his sleep. She was up before 4 o'clock yesterday morning. She had set out the dishes and nearly prepared Daniel's breakfast. Just before calling him she stepped in the bedroom, took up a kerosene lamp, lighted it and turned to go back and awaken her husband. Instead of the cheery call with which she was wont to arouse him he was startled from his slumbers by a shriek.

"Oh, save me! save me, Dan!" were the first words he distinctly understood. They came just after what had seemed to him in his sleep like the dull, faraway roar of a gun. It was really the report of the exploding kerosene lamp.

Leaping from bed as his wife screamed out again McHugh darted into the adjoining rooms. He was more than horrified. Rushing blindly backward and forward, while she beat the air with her hands and shrieked with pain, was his wife, seemingly ablaze from head to foot. The fire had caught in her apron and then in her dress, literally enveloping her in a sheet of flame. Then it had run quickly to her dress waist and so to her hair, which floated out over her shoulders like a wave of fire.

Daniel at once seized his wife around the waist and forcibly bore her to the floor, all the while trying to beat the flames out of her clothing and hair with his bare hands. Then he ripped the blazing dress from her body, and rolled her over and over. It was not until he was severely scorched that he finally extinguished the flames which had enwrapped his wife, and then it was too late to save her life. Almost every inch of her body was blistered and blackened, and her head and neck were as black as burned charcoal.

The police called an ambulance and the terribly burned woman was taken to the Presbyterian Hospital. She lost consciousness on the way, and died in the hospital at fifteen minutes after 7. McHugh's burns were dressed at the hospital and he was put to bed in one of the wards. He bore up manfully through all the intense pain until the news of his wife's death was taken to him. Then he groaned in anguish for the first time. They are said to have been a very devoted couple. They had no children. Mrs. McHugh was 29 years old. Her husband is several years younger. The police and the hospital doctors speak of him as a man of remarkable courage. It will be a long time before he can leave the hospital.

A Candidate For the Papal Succession.

A Rome cable says: The candidacy of Mgr. Zigliara to succeed Leo XIII. is now a public matter. His Eminence is the youngest of the College of Cardinals, being only in his 56th year. He was born at Bonifaccio, Corsica, and took orders as a Dominican monk. The Italians affect to look upon Mgr. Zigliara as the candidate of the French Government, but although born in Corsica, His Eminence has always repudiated his French citizenship. His candidacy is supported by the Dominicans and also by the Jesuits, who at first were inclined to support Cardinal Parocchi. He is also on the best terms with Leo XIII. The most formidable competitor of Mgr. Zigliara for the triple crown is Mgr. Sanfelice, Cardinal Archbishop of Naples, who is backed up by the Italian Government. The party of conciliation in the Sacred College favors Cardinal Monaco de a Valette.

Yellow Fever in Venezuela.

The U. S. Consul at Marcaibo, Venezuela, writes to New York papers: "Having at heart the interests of humanity, at least as regards my own countrymen, I take this way of notifying the health authorities to be very careful of any shipping arriving from this port. The yellow fever is raging fiercely here, and there are two barques here loaded whose crews have all died and which cannot sail until arrival of new crews. All the shipping here is infected and there are many cases in this city. Not long ago two American electrical engineers died here, and while at no time does it appear to be particularly epidemic, there are many cases at all times of the year and everybody not acclimated seems to take it."

Another Boulangist Manifesto.

A Paris cable says: Gen. Boulanger has issued a manifesto to the electors of Montmartre. In it he says: "If I ask the suffrages of the people, it is because I represent, not the personality depicted by my calumniators, but a national sentiment aspiring to throw off the burden of a growing debt and the intolerable iniquities and humiliation to which the country is subjected." Despite the refusal of the Prefect of the Seine to receive Gen. Boulanger's declaration of candidacy for member of the Chamber of Deputies, placards were posted in Montmartre, in the Department of the Seine, announcing that he would be a candidate. The police have torn down the placards and arrested the men who posted them.

Almost Driven to Cannibalism.

An Auckland despatch gives the following: The Tonga steamer Wainui has brought here the captain and crew of the British ship Garston, which foundered in mid-ocean. The shipwrecked sailors were 23 days in an open boat without food or water. On the 22nd day the men, driven to desperation by hunger and thirst, decided that one of their number must be sacrificed to save the lives of the others. They were casting lots to see who should be the victim when they sighted Wallis Island. The natives of the island assisted the exhausted men to land and treated them most kindly. A mission boat took them to Tonga.

A SINGULAR COUNSEL FEE.

How the Arkansas Legislature Paid Garland's Little Bill.

A Washington despatch says: Ex-Attorney-General Garland has been chasing deer and having a good time at Hominy Hill. He wrote the other day to a friend to say that he had just killed two fine bucks. He explains, also, his apparent disregard for the game laws. The State of Arkansas owed him some $5,000 for legal services. He put in a bill for half that amount, and said he would call it square if the bill was paid as presented. At the last meeting of the Legislature money should have been appropriated to pay him, but unexpectedly the bill was defeated. There was no dispute over the indebtedness, but some of the old Legislatures were simply opposed to paying. The reasons they gave for their opposition were verified and eccentric. One old fellow, wearing a choker collar and a full suit of black, said that during the last campaign he had heard Garland tell stories that were off color, and he did not think that the State should vote money to a man who would do such a thing. Another man gave as his reason for voting against the Bill that the ex-Attorney-General played poker, and that to pay him the money would be to encourage vice. A friendly member ultimately suggested: "Garland is always here along during the month of August, and has to be a going some about the middle of September. If he does chase deer with hounds he's a mighty good shot. I propose that we just change the law so as to allow the shooting of deer to begin the 1st of August instead of the 1st of September. That will allow him a month of shooting.

This proposition met with approval and the game law was amended accordingly. All during last month Garland was chasing deer under the new law, and he says he is perfectly satisfied with the settlement of his claim against the State.

The Nickel in the Slot Outdone.

At a recent meeting of the French Academy M. Lippmann presented a note by M. G. Guercuil, in which it is suggested that by the combined use of a phonograph and an apparatus for instantaneous photography and reproduction of the pictures obtained, it would be possible to reproduce at any future time not only the future speech of a person, but also bring before the audience a vivid picture of the person's gestures and facial expression.

The procedure would be somewhat as follows: A person speaking or singing into the phonograph would be photographed by an automatic apparatus geared with the barrel of the phonograph. The pictures would be instantaneous, and taken at the rate of, say, ten pictures per second. They would then be developed and arranged in a special lantern for reproduction on a screen isochronously with the phonograph, when the latter is reproducing the speech. An audience might thus be enabled not only to hear the utterances of, say, a famous actor, but also see himself and his actions represented on a screen. About a year and a half ago M. A. Bandsept, of Brussels, experimented with a similar apparatus.

What the Weather-wise Prognosticate.

"An Old Settler" says that he has reached the conclusion "we are to have an early fall and a long, cold, hard winter" and figures it out as follows: "In the first place try the skin of any of your fruit. You will find your apples, peaches and grapes, and all your fruit, for that matter which is home-grown, with a thicker and tougher skin than you have seen for several years. That is one of the indications. That is the way nature takes care of her products. Last winter apples and other fruits were so thin-skinned and tender that it was hard to gather them without bruising them, if you will remember, and we had an extraordinary mild winter. Corn is another of nature's signboards. The ears this year are protected by thicker and stronger husks than I have seen before for years. Wheat and rye straw are tougher, hay is winter and the seed pods are better protected than usual. These are old farmers' signs."

Slashed to Death with a Butcher Knife.

A Zanesville, O., despatch of last (Monday) night says: Frank Amos, one of the most prominent citizens of Morgan county, was murdered at his home in the western part of the county to-day by Mrs. Hamton, his niece, who hacked his face and head to pieces with a butcher knife, which it appears she carried for weeks avowedly for that purpose. Amos was picking berries in the field with his wife when the attack was made. Mrs. Amos and a man passing by were attracted by Amos' cries, and reached him only in time to see him breathe his last, and to see Mrs. Hamton and her daughter run away. The murder grew out of a law suit in which the testimony of Amos threw the costs on Hamton.

Did Her Uncle Murder Her?

A Waverly, O., despatch says: Chalkley LeConey, of Merchantville, N.J., has been arrested here charged with murdering his niece, Annie LeConey, near Merchantville last Monday morning. Chalkley LeConey brought the remains of his niece here to the residence of her father, James LeConey, and the arrest was made on a telegraphic order from the District Attorney at Camden, N.J. Chalkley denies the charge, and James says the arrest is an outrage. It is stated that a pair of bloodstained trousers, which were identified as Chalkley LeConey's, were found in the house near Merchantville, and that a pair of shoes which LeConey had worn were also found with blood stains on the bottoms. There is said to be other evidence against him.

—Simcoe—I tell you, they can say all they please about woman's extravagance, but she can dress well on a sum that would keep a man looking shabby. Brown (dryly)—That's just it. The sum that my wife dresses well on keeps me looking shabby.

"How do you feel now, Sue?" asked one Chicago woman of another who had just secured a divorce. "I feel unmanned," she replied.

—Maiden—What can a woman do when a man that has won her affection refuses to marry her? Lawyer—Is he rich? No; hasn't a cent. She can appoint a day of general thanksgiving and invite both families to participate.

DISTRIBUTION OF MERCHANDISE.

The Americans admit that the English can beat them in handling freights. One aid to this is the very efficient warehouse system in connection with all the leading freight depots. This is on such a scale that the task of dissecting merchandise and allotting it to its respective cars is greatly simplified; whilst the extent of ground covered by the goods yards themselves enables the companies to marshal the cars into trains with the greatest possible speed. Some idea of the extent to which efforts to simplify and so accelerate freight traffic have been carried may be formed from one or two examples. The London & Northwestern goods yard at Edge Hill, Liverpool, contains 57½ miles of line, costing $10,000,000; and in addition this company has in the same city five other freight depots, two of them reached by tunnels each a mile and a quarter in length, constructed for their use alone. There are also in Liverpool twelve other goods depots belonging to other companies. At Crewe, another London & Northwestern depot, the area covered by sidings and shunting lines is 200 acres, with 34 miles of running line and siding room for 6,500 cars. What has been done by the premier company has been done on a relative scale by others. Comparisons could be constantly drawn to our disadvantage between the celerity with which goods consigned from the United States to interior points in Great Britain reach their destinations and the tardy movement in the distribution of merchandise consigned from England to points outside of New York or other receiving ports. Apart from the question of speed of trains, there is no doubt that the advantage in England is largely due to the superior working of the preliminaries before starting trains on their journeys, rendered possible by the facilities here named.

Josh Billings' Philosophy.

I never knu a man whose name was George Washington Lafayette Goodrich, Esq., and who always signed his name for the full amount, but what was a bigger man on paper than he was by natur.

As a general thing, an individual who is neat in his person is neat in his morals.

Man is mi brother, and I konsider that i am nearer related tew him thru his vices than I am thru his virtews.

There is nothing about which the world makes so few blunders, and the individual so menny, as a man's actual importance among his fellow-kriters.

A man with a very small head is like a pin without enny—very apt tew git into things beyond his depth.

The pashuns ov an old man are often like his teeth—they cease to trouble him, simply bekauze the nerve is ded.

The only pedigree worth transmitting is virtew; and this is the very thing that kant be transmitted.

Affekshun has made more phools than the Lord has.

About the nearest tew absolute insolvency that a man kan git in this world, and think he is doing rite, is tew leave nothing but a pedigree tew his family.

Is LeCaron in Chicago?

The Chicago News of Tuesday says: Officer Garrity, who is stationed at the corner of Jackson and Dearborn streets, was told a startling story this afternoon by Mail Carrier O'Brien, who declared that he had every reason to believe that LeCaron was in Chicago.

O'Brien told me," said Garrity to-day, "that while he was assorting his mail yesterday a man came to the window and asked the address of a certain Englishman who used to be connected with the Western British-American. O'Brien had a friend standing there at the time, and he at once declared: 'Why, that's LeCaron.' He claimed to know the spy very well and at once rushed outside to greet the man supposed to be LeCaron. When he got into the corridor, however, the fellow had disappeared. O'Brien's friend said he could not be mistaken and that he would take an oath that the man was LeCaron.

There has been some talk of the spy's giving testimony in the Cronin case, and this story told by Mail Carrier O'Brien gives some color to the rumor that LeCaron will appear on the stand. O'Brien's very peculiar statement, however, could not be confirmed this afternoon.

Smithsonian Ubiquity.

The St. Louis Republican has traced the name John Smith through various languages with this result:

In Latin he is Johannes Smithus; the Italians smoothe him off with Giovanni Smith; the Spaniards render him as Juan Smithus; the Hollanders adopt him as Hans Schmidt; the French flatten him out as Jean Smeet; the Russian sneezes and barks as he says Ivan Smittowski.

In China he is known as Jovan Shimmit; in Iceland as Johne Smithson; in Tuscaroras you forget all about Pocahontas and Powhatan when you hear them call Ton Qua Smittis.

In Wales they speak of him as Jihon Scmidd; in Mexico he is Jantli F'Smitti; among the Greek ruins the guide speaks of him as Ion Smitson, and in Turkey he is utterly disguised as Yee Self.

Just Like a Woman Does.

"What you working at now, 'Rastus?"

"I've tooken a job of carpenter work, Boss; mending up de holes in old Dr. Schmerz's stable."

"Can you hit a nail on the head every time?"

"Not yet, sah; but I can hit de nail on de thumb four times out o' three."—Puck.

Wm. H. Dean, Toronto, the young man charged with abducting and seducing Marion Atkinson, was allowed out on his own bail, Inspector Archibald stating that he had consented to marry the girl. Dean has been in jail since his arrest, and has had lots of time to reflect on his folly. Later in the day the marriage took place at Erskine Presbyterian Church, Rev. W. A. Hunter conducting the ceremony and Mr. A. Thomson giving away the bride.

Delia Walker, aged 19, committed suicide by drowning at Langdon, N. H., on Friday night. She was a beautiful and accomplished girl. She was spending her vacation at home expecting to return this week to an art school in Boston. The cause of her suicide is a mystery. She was an intimate friend and classmate of Miss Skinner, of Keene, and Miss Walker of Springfield, Vt., both of whom committed suicide last winter.

Vicinity Chips.

Characteristics of the Past Week Carefully Culled for the Curious.

SEASONABLE.

PRELUDE.

The forest trees begin to blush,
The passing clouds begin to gush,
The highways all begin to slush,
The waterproofs are on the rush,
The waterways are getting flush,
The land is soft as graham mush,
The chilling winds our hair will brush,
And chunks of ice the spirit crush.

EPILOGUE.

But winds may come and winds may go,
Likewise the rains and big fall show;
The chilling winds and mushy mud,
The summer nipped in half blown bud,
All, all may come and go again,
But our delinquents must remain--
Which makes us shout as loud's we're able
In them we've found one thing that's stable.

Osprey fall show at Maxwell to-morrow (Friday.)

The fall assizes will open in Owen Sound on Tuesday, November 5.

Mr. T. Carruthers, of Kimberley, has the grateful thanks of The Advance for a beautiful basket of pears.

Dr. Sinclair, the eminent Scottish specialist, will be at Munshaw's hotel, Flesherton, Saturday, Oct. 5.

Mr. Geo. Mitchell, banker, was suddenly called away on Monday evening to the sick bed of his father at Alliston.

For one dollar you get The Advance and an agricultural monthly paper for one year. Just think of it—dream over it you farmers. Sample copies at this office.

Mr. Beecroft, of Flesherton greenhouses, was successful in bringing away fourteen prizes—seven first and seven seconds—from the Great Northern Exhibition in Collingwood last week.

The regular meeting of Fountain Council, R.T. of T., will be held on Wednesday evening of next week, instead of Tuesday evening, on account of the harvest home festival on the regular night of meeting.

Messrs. Osborne & Inkster, of Maxwell, have lately purchased from Mr. J.H. Campaign an Advance engine and cleaner, manufactured at Fingal, Ont. It is a handsome piece of machinery, and is expected to do exceptionally good work.

There was a slight error in the East Grey prize list as published last week. In grade cows James Mercer took first instead of J.G. Carson. The mistake was caused by an error in the numbering of entries.

There will be an auction sale of valuable church property and fittings, etc., known as the Hodgson church, on the corner of lot 7, Con. 3, Township Euphrasia, at 2 p.m. on Saturday, the 26th October, 1889. Look for advertisement in this paper next week.

Arm Broken.

Thomas Gilchrist, son of Mr. Wm. Gilchrist, fell in the barn one day last week while drawing in grain and broke his arm.

Auction Sale.

An auction sale of live stock will be held on the farm of John Crawford, lot No. 9, 11th con., Osprey, on Thursday, Oct. 10. Seventeen months' credit on all sums over five dollars. T. Spears, auctioneer.

Monopolies and combines are a source manac to the public wellfare, and should be stamped out. So should catarrh. Mr. J. Duncan Maple Creek, N.W.T., says:—Nasal Balm has done my catarrh good, more than all the numerous remedies I had previously tried combined. I have improved so much that I believe one more bottle will completely cure me.

Accident.

Mr. Wm. Brewster, while returning home from the fair on Tuesday last, had his buggy badly demolished. When in the vicinity of the old Morey house his horses took fright and ran the buggy over the side of a bridge, tearing off the top and otherwise injuring it. Mr. Brewster was uninjured.

Valuable Curios.

Some time ago Mr. M. Richardson was made the recipient of two valuable pieces of Chinese furniture, consisting of a hall chair and table. The articles are built of a dark Chinese wood of great strength, inlaid in peculiar designs with mother of pearl, and are very valuable. The most curious part of their manufacture is the entire absence of any glue or nails in their construction, all joints being keyed together in a manner peculiar to the Chinese.

Church Opening.

A new and commodious brick church was opened on Sunday last at Bethel, some three miles south of Proton Station. Rev. Mr. Buggin, chairman of the district, preached in the morning, Rev. J.W. Shilton, B.A., in the afternoon, and Rev. Mr. McCaul, Presbyterian minister, in the evening. The crowd present was enormous, only about two-thirds being able to obtain entrance to the church in the afternoon. The appointment is in charge of Rev. Mr. Moss, of Dundalk. On Monday evening following a very successful teameeting was given in the church, at which Revs. Messrs. Buggin and Shilton were the principal speakers. The original cost of the church was over eight hundred dollars. Cash taken in and subscriptions leave an indebtedness of only $241 remaining.

Personals.

Miss Christoe returned home on Saturday last.

Mrs. Baskerville, of Manitoulin Island, who has been spending the summer with her daughter, Mrs. W. Trimble, returned to the Island on Friday last.

Annual Harvest Home Festival.

The friends of the Methodist church, Flesherton Circuit, will hold their annual harvest home festival as follows: Sermons in the Methodist church, Flesherton, by the pastor, having special reference to the old Jewish feast of the harvest, on Sabbath Oct. 5th. On Tuesday Oct. 8th, from 5.30 to 8 p.m., dinner will be served by the ladies in the lecture room, after which addresses will be delivered in the church by a number of talented laymen. Rev. W H. Moss, of Dundalk, Rev. Mr. Watson of Flesherton, Rev. Mr. Emes of Markdale and Rev. Mr. Buggin of Markdale, have been invited and are expected to be present. Thos. Gamey, Esq., reeve of Osprey, will take the chair. Music will be furnished by the church choir. Admission 25 cents, children 15 cents. Proceeds for church purposes.

A Lecture Sermon.

Mr. Theodore Malcheff, a young Bulgarian from Macedonia, occupied the pulpit of the Presbyterian Church in Flesherton on Sunday afternoon, and gave an extremely interesting discourse upon political, educational and physical matters in his own country. The Greek church is the established church in that country, and the speaker gave a very vivid description of its hollow, meaningless rites, and compared them to the sincere, unhidden light of the christian religion. He gave a short synopsis of the struggles of his countrymen during the past thousand years, and described the terrible ignorance of the common people upon biblical and religious matters. He then gave an account of his own conversion and struggle to secure an education. His tenacity of purpose and the difficulties which he overcame are remarkable. Landing in New York five years ago with only five dollars in his pocket and in complete ignorance of the English language, he has now fought his way up to a college course, having entered Toronto University last fall. After Mr. Malcheff completes his course there it is his intention to enter Knox college and prepare himself theologically to return home and convey the gospel to his benighted brethern.

OUR TABLE.

The Cosmepolitain for September is to hand. Special.

It is with pleasure that we announce to our many patrons that we have made arrangements with that wide-awake, illustrated farm magazine, the American Farmer, published at Fort Wayne, Ind., and read by nearly 200,000 farmers, by which that great publication will be mailed direct, FREE, to the address of any of our subscribers who will come in and pay up all arrearages on subscription and one year in advance from date, and to any new subscriber who will pay one year in advance. This is a grand opportunity to obtain a first class farm journal free. The American Farmer is a large 16-page journal, of national circulation, which ranks among the leading agricultural papers. It treats the question of economy in agriculture and the rights and privileges of that vast body of citizens -American farmers—whose industry is the basis of all material and national prosperity. Its highest purpose is the elevation and ennobling of Agriculture through the higher and broader education of men and women engaged in its pursuits. The regular subscription price of the American Farmer is $1.00 per year. IT COSTS YOU NOTHING. From any one number, ideas can be obtained that will be worth thrice the subscription price to you or members of your household, YET YOU GET IT FREE. Call and see sample copy

Priceville.

From our own Correspondent.

We notice that your previous correspondent has retired from the arena, and we presume it must be either from press of business or that the task has proved too onerous for his health. However this may be, Mr. Editor, we believe that Priceville is not yet destined to become obsolete from an intelligent point of view, and we will endeavor from week to week to satisfy you with a few items of interest from our village and surrounding country.

The pulpit of the Presbyterian church is still vacant; we hope ere long to have a permanent minister.

Rev. Mr. Ottewell preaches morning and evening in the Methodist Church. This change has been brought about by the amalgamation of the Stone and Priceville congregations.

The contract of carrying the mail between Priceville and the Station has changed hands. Mr. Cairns of the Crown hotel will now do service for Her Majesty.

Mr. Michael Riley secured first prize at the Durham fair for his geese. They are fine ones.

Mr. Neil McKinnon of McKinnon & Co. has returned from Toronto, where he was visiting during the exhibition. He reports having a pleasant time and is as hale, hearty and handsome as ever.

Notwithstanding the clemency of the weather, a certain young gentleman from the station, bristling with matrimonial intentions, makes his weekly visits to this village.

Mr. John McArthur has completed the contract of repairing the gravel road between Priceville and the Station. We understand that Mr. Donald McDonald (big Dan) and Mr. Robert Conkey has the sub-contract, and that they have buried the hatchet. It is reported that they even smoke out of the same pipe. Truly the lion and the lamb have lain down together. This was a fine stroke of diplomacy on Mr. McArthur's part; he shall receive his reward, for "blessed are the peacemakers."

Where is the place for pounding cattle? This was the pertinent question asked by a gentleman hailing from the station as he drove up a herd of cattle. It appears that there is now no regularly appointed pound-keeper in this place. This is a matter that should be looked into by the Township Council.

We understand that Mr. Jas. Watson intends to run a stage between Priceville and the station to convey passengers and freight.

Don't forget Priceville fair on Thursday, 3rd Oct. Bring your sisters, cousins and aunts. The big horn won't be here. We don't indulge in horn blowing but we have a good show. VIDI.

Some of the Democrats in the Fourth District of Massachusetts are working for the nomination of John L. Sullivan for Congress.

The Earl of Galloway, accused of criminally assaulting little girls, is to be tried on October 14th.

The body of Thos. Pemberton, the last victim of the Quebec disaster, was recovered Monday.

Fifty people were killed or injured in a railway collision in Italy.

Fire at Butte, Montana, caused a loss of $1,000,000.

FALL ANNOUNCEMENT, 1889.

J. E. MOORE.

Undertaker, Upholsterer and Furniture Warerooms

Begs to tender his sincere thanks for the very liberal share of patronage received during the past two years. We have tried to please, and from the steady growth and increase in our sales, we feel that we have succeeded in giving very general satisfaction to all who have patronized us in any way, either by purchase or recommending others to us. We again offer our hearty thanks with the assurance that with the experience gained in the past two years and a better knowledge of the needs of our patrons, we shall redouble our exertion to meet your wants and retain the confidence we have so largely enjoyed. In entering on our third year of being the people's house Furnishing and Undertaker, it is perhaps well again as at the first to speak of some of our leading lines, feeling it is unnecessary to quote prices as the fact is established beyond controversy that we sell cheaper than any other house in the county. We are enabled to do this, having no rent to pay and doing business on a small profit (Cash principles). Thus doing away with the two largest items most business men have to contend with, big rent and bad debts. Our stock at present consists of Bedroom Furniture of every description, Bedsteads all prices and styles. Woven wire Springs and cott bedsteads, Mattresses of wool and seagrass, dressing cases, Bureaus, Wash stands and Mirrors of all sizes and kinds. In parlor furniture we carry suites in Plush and Hair cloth, Sofas and Lounges in Rattan, Tapestry, Silk and Hair Cloth Cane, perforated, Rattan and Plush, sitting and rocking chairs, Whatnots, Center and Side Tables, Pictures, Music Racks, Picture Easels and the celebrated Karn or Thomas Organs. For the Dining room we have tables of every description calling attention to our cheap extension tables at $6.00, dining chairs in cane, perforated and wood seats and a special line of lounges for dining room use, Sideboards in a variety of styles. For the kitchen we have chairs to suit everybody. Cupboards for the rich and for the poor, and tables made on short notice just to suit you. Again thanking you for past patronage, we invite you to call again, assuring you that we are in better position than ever to supply your needs in house furnishings, or in undertaking, in which department we have a full line and good hearse. Our prices in this as in other branches of our large business, are on a fair living basis, and as we give this our best personal attention, by promptness, by neatness and cleanliness in all our departments, we feel that the wants of this growing country in this department are fully met.

QUEBEC'S TERRIBLE CALAMITY.

Forty Persons Killed and Injured by a Land-slide.

SEVEN HOUSES BURIED.

A Quebec despatch of Thursday says: About half-past 7 o'clock this evening a terrible land-slide occurred immediately below Dufferin Terrace, by which seven houses were crushed out of shape and from twenty to forty people killed and wounded. Those who witnessed the fall of the rock say that they heard a long, loud report, as of several cannon, and on looking up towards the terrace and citadel were horrified by the sight of an immense mass of stones, rock and earth breaking loose and rushing down the three hundred feet of a declivity upon the doomed houses below. Immediately the air was filled with dust, so that no one could see ten feet in front of him, and breathing was made difficult. This was followed by the sounds of timbers crashing and yielding to the immense power of the avalanche, and the shouting and screaming of men, women and children in all the agony of despair. The avalanche was caused by the hot weather of the past few weeks cracking the earth and rock, which were loosened and driven down by the heavy rain of the last few days. Immediately the men of the water police, whose station is near the scene of the accident, set to work to while the general alarm was sounded, which called out the fire brigade and police, for what between lamps and stoves breaking the houses soon caught fire. A telephone message was also sent to the Citadel requesting the assistance of a detachment of "B" Battery, R.C.A. The flames were, however, soon extinguished, and the men from the Battery began the work of extricating the unfortunates from the ruins, assisted by many of the citizens. As each of the sufferers was rescued he was carried into the quarters of the water police, where a large staff of medical men was on hand as well as a priest, who did all they could to alleviate their sufferings. All sorts of wild rumors were soon flying about the city, and conflicting reports were met with everywhere. At times it would be said that as many as twenty were killed, and at others that the injured were few and far between. This is all accounted for by the reason that it was next to impossible to obtain particulars, owing to the fact that when the rock fell it covered the roadbed to the depth of about twenty feet, so that in order to get at the ruins one must pass along the wharves at the foot of the cliff over huge piles of coal, and through immense crowds of horror stricken relatives and sympathizing onlookers.

MANY HARROWING SCENES

occurred as the dead and wounded were carried in, some with broken limbs, others bruised and many badly burnt. Here an old woman would be brought in, frantic with grief and calling for a brother or husband or a child. Young children followed by weeping mothers and distracted fathers were carried in the arms of strong, resolute men almost melted into tears.

OCCUPANTS OF THE HOUSES.

The occupants of the destroyed houses were the following with their families: Chas. Allan, Thos. Berrigan, Tim Berrigan, Henry Black, Mrs. W. Bracken, James Bradley, Stephen Burke, Michael Deehey, Thomas Farrell, Patrick Fitzgerald, Henry Lawson, Robert Lawson, Richard Leahy, Frank Carslow, James Hayden, Joseph Kemp, Luke Kirwin, Henry Mullins, Richard Maybury, Mrs. Widow, John O'Dowd, John O'Neil, William Stephens, Thomas Power, John Ready, John Henry. The dead bodies recovered and recognized are those of Thomas Farrell and his little daughter, his wife and other children being still in the ruins; P. Fitzgerald's two children, two children of Stephen Burke and one of James Bradley.

RESCUING THE WOUNDED.

A later despatch says: Some scenes were witnessed which were extremely heartrending. A young boy named Power was released from the ruins. He, however, begged piteously to be allowed to remain and die with his mother and sisters, who were also in the ruins near by. He as well as his parents and sisters were removed alive but badly wounded. A man named Berrigan was found near by pinned solidly under a huge rock. He was speaking to friends around him, who were unable at the time to remove the immense boulder and relieve him from his agonizing and perilous position, as the rock was in such a position that it was feared when it was moved it would cause his death. Up to the present hour, 11.30 p.m., there have been six bodies taken from the ruins, namely: Thomas Farrell and two of his children, two children named Burke, and one unknown child. Farrell's mother-in-law, Mrs. Allen, and her husband are still in the ruins. About twenty-five persons have been removed from the debris badly injured. Some have broken arms and legs, others being badly crushed and mutilated in all shapes. It is supposed that at least fifty persons are yet under the ruins. The roadway is blocked with solid boulders to the height of fifteen feet in some places.

THE MOUNTAIN STILL CRUMBLING.

Midnight.—Under some of the houses crushed cries of "Help, help," are heard, but no immediate aid can be given. An old soldier named Maybray, bearer of several medals of merit, who fought in the Crimean war, is heard shouting, "For God's sake, do assist me, please." Although soldiers and citizens are working to the relief like Trojans, very little progress is made in recovering the bodies owing to the stupendous mass of rock and debris encumbering the ruins. About 175 bodies are supposed to be buried under the debris. The body of a woman named Mrs. Berrigan has just been pulled out. It was mangled and bleeding, and presented such a sight as to affect the strongest man. More rocks are still crumbling down, and the people of the locality are fleeing with dread lest the whole boulder forming the highest point of Quebec will give way. Help is coming in abundance from all quarters of the city. Accidents are occurring every moment to the rescuers. The crashing of timbers and the rolling of huge masses of rocks put the life and limbs of the volunteers in continual danger.

DUFFERIN TERRACE UNDERMINED.

The mass of rock detached from the cliff's side left a vacant space of extraordinary dimensions. It has worked immediately under the Dufferin terrace, undermining the support of that great promenade, so that it is now unsafe. The northeast bastion of the citadel is perpendicular with the cliff sides. Huge rocks are still menacing the locality, hanging as they are on the flank of the mountain. Ten corpses and sixteen wounded are now taken out. The work is still carried on cheerily, but it will take several days to haul out all the bodies. The damage will, it is said, exceed $100,000. The houses in the locality were built of stone and brick, and inhabited by ship laborers, etc. The scenes witnessed around the place of disaster are in every sense of the word heartrending. Here a mother seeks a child and a desolate man digs in the debris in hopes of finding his wife.

SHRIEKS AND CRIES

fill the air. It is so that no pen can describe it. The officers and men of the Royal School of Cavalry are coming to the rescue with ropes, picks and shovels. About 600 men are now working with a heart clearing out rocks and debris of all descriptions. Three bodies are just taken out from the catacombs. Their names are not ascertained. Two are dead, while the third's heart is still beating. One has his skull crushed in, another has an arm missing. The bodies are covered with coagulated blood and dust, and are a sickening spectacle to behold. The workers are cheered to work by some prominent citizens.

The scene of the terrible disaster is being visited by thousands, who block up the narrow street and make it a difficult task for any one to move in any direction, there being but one narrow street between the rock and the river. There is a complete stoppage of traffic except by climbing over the debris of rock and dwelling houses intermixed. So great is the mass of material which will have to be removed that the Allan Steamship Company's and other business houses whose establishments are west of the slide are occupying temporary offices in the eastern part of the lower town. The work of searching the ruins is going on slowly, though a large force of men is engaged in the labor. The shipping office in the Dominion Government building has been turned into a temporary morgue. Over twenty bodies lie in it. It is difficult to identify some of them, so much have they been disfigured and crushed. The following have been identified; Thomas Farrell, sen., and his children Lawrence Farrell, Stella Farrell and Agnes Farrell; Mrs. Stephen Burke, Miss Allan, Willie Black, Mrs. McKenna, Michael Deehy, Mrs. Widow Bracken, an old lady who had passed her 80th year; Eliza Bradley, Esther Fitzgerald, aged 4 years; Patrick Fitzgerald, aged 1 year; Mrs. Leahey, Charles Allan, Mrs. Charles Allan, Norah Kennedy, an adopted daughter of Mrs. Richard Leahey. There are several bodies not yet identified. Two of them are supposed to be the little daughters of Mrs. Stephen Burke. Several of those persons reported missing have turned up, but it is thought there will be ten or more victims to be added to the above list. No list of the injured has yet been made up. They were removed to the different hospitals and to friends' houses as they were removed from the ruins. Only one or two are supposed to be fatally injured. The City Council are holding a special meeting this morning to consider what their best course of action will be to complete the work of recovering the remaining dead, and of opening up the street. It is feared that a large part of the rock adjoining the site of the slide will come down, as large crevices have appeared, and the rain is still falling and may repeat the operations which caused last night's disaster. People are moving out of the neighboring houses. There has been no lack of volunteers for the work at the ruins, but there is a lack of intelligent direction, as there is no person in authority. Among the most useful laborers are two large gangs from the works at the Louise docks, who were sent up by the contractors, Messrs. Larkin & Connolly. Several citizens, including Hon. Mr. Mercier, have sent sums of money to Mr. Gregory, agent of the Marine Department, to be used by him to relieve any immediate distress amongst the homeless women and children. The cliff being the property of the Dominion Government, application was made by telegraph to Sir Hector Langevin at Ottawa, who promptly responded, giving directions to have the roadway cleared and expressing his sorrow at the calamity to his native city. There were several families of strangers from Newfoundland in the houses destroyed; the loss of life among them is uncertain.

The site of the landslide of last night is almost identical with that in the year of 1841, when eight buildings were crushed and thirty-two persons killed. To prevent a repetition of that disaster the Dominion Government purchased the buildings along the base of the cliff and removed them, putting up a heavy revetment wall, which has served its purpose well in preventing accidents from small slides, which were common enough to attract but little attention. In fact, some of the people who have now lost their lives saw premonitory symptoms of the disaster, one or two small slides having taken place before the great mass of rock started. The houses now destroyed all stood on the river side of the roadway, and were not thought to be in danger, but the immense mass of rock swept clear across the roadway and over the brick buildings, demolishing them like cardboard. The place from which the greater mass of rock fell is just below the King's Bastion at the west end of Dufferin terrace instead of the gradual slope from the foot of the terrace wall to the street below which appears a perpendicular rock rising like a wall from a huge mass of debris at the foot close up to the wall of the terrace. It rises so straight and clear that it might be taken for a part of the wall itself until a proper examination is made. It is hard to speak positively, but from present appearances there seems little doubt but that the westerly end of Dufferin terrace will have to be abandoned or very much narrowed down.

The thousands of tons of rock have fallen away at the narrowest point of the terrace, where it was crowded towards the river by the citadel works. The mass moved is, roughly speaking, about 600 feet frontage by 80 feet in depth.

Some of the masses of fallen rock must weigh nearly twenty tons, and there are so many huge blocks that it makes the work of clearance very difficult.

The working parties are now better organized and equipped and are making more headway with the work.

The list of those killed and wounded, so far as known, is as follows: Killed—Thos. Farrell, three Farrell children, two Burke children, one Bradley child, one child of P. Fitzgerald, Mrs. Bracken, Mrs. Stephen Burke, Henry Black, William Black, Thomas Nolan and Mrs. Ready. The wounded are: Mr. and Mrs. Carlson, Mr. J. O'Neil, Mrs. Luke Kerwin and child, Thomas Berrigan, Dennis Berrigan, James Hayden, Wm. Stevens and son, Nelly Deehey, Patrick Fitzgerald, Martin Ready, three of Maybury children, Stephen Burke and his mother, Mrs. Fitzgerald, Thomas Graham, William Power, wife and child, Mrs. Thomas Farrel. Some dead and wounded are now being taken out of the ruins. The names of some are not yet ascertained.

A last Friday night's despatch from Quebec says: Some 20,000 persons have visited the scene of the disaster during the day, have crowded into the morgue and seized every point inside and outside the building where a glimpse could be had of the bodies of the victims. Many women who obtained an entrance had to be removed in a fainting condition, the mangled bodies being a sight to try the nerves of the strongest men.

Preparations are being made for the funerals of the killed, who will be buried at the joint expense of the city and the Local Government.

Among those buried by the rocks are a young couple named Nolan, who were married a few weeks ago. Nolan could have escaped, but lost his life trying to get his wife out of the house.

It is thought the King's Bastion, on the Citadel, will have to be removed, as it is now so much nearer the edge of the rock, with unsafe crevices in front of it. As a precautionary measure all communication with the Bastion has been cut off and the morning and evening guns will no longer be fired from it.

This afternoon it was decided to use small charges of powder to break up the huge boulders covering the roadway, as it is a certainty that there can be nothing living beneath them.

The horrors of the dreadful day are still succeeding each other. While workers were busy clearing the debris of a crumbled building faint groans were heard at intervals from under the huge pile of rock. The efforts of the volunteers were concentrated to that point, and after three hours' hard work the bleeding body of Joe Kemp was extricated from the mass of rock. The poor man was in the most miserable condition. Both legs were broken at the knees, the left arm was fractured above the elbow, and several ribs were also fractured. Kemp will not live two hours longer. He is unconscious, and a livid pallor and deathlike appearance prevail in the man's face. Two hours later his wife's body was taken out of the wreck. Her head was almost severed from the body, and indications of the most revolting and violent death were seen on her corpse. Further away another hideous spectacle was offered to the sight The corpse of a young woman, Mrs. Lawson, who had been admired in her lifetime both for her beauty and amiability, was extricated from under a rafter, on which about ten tons of stones and matter were lying. The sight was more than many could bear. She was smashed almost flat The abdomen was ripped open, her entrails wre scattered about. Her husband, at the sight of his beloved wife's remains, became frantic, and is now insane for perhaps the remainder of his life.

A man named Michal Bradley, who had gone almost crazy when told that all his family had perished in the landslide, discovered while working over the wreck of his house his 5-year-old daughter still alive; his joy was indescribable. He kissed and patted the mangled form, called her by endearing names, fondled her as a mother would her baby. It is thought the child will live.

Up to this time the number of corpses found is twenty-five, and the wounded is eighteen.

She Was Afraid of the Doctors.

Mrs. Elizabeth Harper, wife of W. W. Harper, a jeweller at Hackensack, N.J., committed suicide Sunday night by hanging herself to a door-knob in her sleeping apartment with a strip of white muslin. Mrs. Harper had been ill for several months and was attended by a professional nurse. Recently her physician and the family had discussed the advisability of removing her to a hospital for an operation. This had a depressing effect upon a mind weakened by long illness. Mrs. Harper was well known and highly respected in the community, and was a leading worker in the First Reformed Church, of Hackensack.

Mexico's Liquor License System.

In the city of Mexico the income from the taxation of liquors and the license on saloons is very large indeed. Every liquor and pulque shop pays a monthly license. In addition to the license fees on saloons, an octroi, or entry tax, is collected on all pulque coming within the city limits. For the fiscal year just ended this gate tax amounted to the sum of $500,000 or more than $1,500 a day. The pulque shops open at 6 o'clock in the morning and close at 5 o'clock in the afternoon, and not one of them has a back door.

Our Big Natural Water Power.

The amount of water passing over Niagara Falls varies with the height of the river. Prof. W. D. Gunning estimates the average amount at 18,000,000 cubic feet per minute. Allowing 62½ pounds to the cubic foot, this would give a total of 562,500 tons per minute, or 25,312,500 tons in forty-five minutes, of which somewhat more than two-thirds passes over the Horseshoe Falls. Other estimates place the total amount passing over both falls as high as 100,000,000 tons per hour. In comparison, the recent flood at Johnstown was a gill.

Dervish means "one who lies at the door." It is not proper to call a returned fisherman a dervish, for he begins it as soon as he gets on the ferryboat.

FLOODS IN JAPAN.

Fifteen Thousand People Killed and Many Towns Destroyed.

RELIEF FOR THE SUFFERERS.

Trees Uprooted and Swept Upon the Fields.

A Wednesday's San Francisco despatch says: Japanese papers place the number of persons drowned in the floods of August 20th in the city of Wakayamo and in the districts of Minami-Muro, Higashi-Muro, Nishi-Muro and Hidaka at 10,000, and the number of persons receiving relief at 20,424. The River Kinokuni swelled from thirteen to eighteen feet above its normal level and the embankments at the village of Iwahashi were washed away. The village and about forty-eight hamlets were covered by the raging waters. On August 19 an enormous mass of earth fell from the mountain near the village of Tennokawa and stopped the course of the river of the same name, which being already swollen submerged the village and drowned nearly all the inhabitants. A number of villagers belonging to Tsujido took refuge in their temple on high ground, but when the land slide occurred fifty persons were buried alive.

The steamer Gaelic, from Yokohama, brings details of the overwhelming disaster in Japan. The Province of Kii, in the southwestern part of Japan, has been visited by the greatest floods known in the history of the country. Over 15,000 people have been killed, several towns have been destroyed and others have been wrecked. The catastrophe was caused by floods in the western part of the Province and by the crumbling of a mountain, which buried six villages. The early part of August was remarkable for its rains, and the rapid rise of the rivers soon became alarming. The banks of the Kinogawa, a stream over 100 miles long, broke near the city of Wakamayo on August 19th, and a mountain of water rushed out upon the fields and towns, wrecking houses, bridges, fences, temples and all things in its path. In this district 200 houses were carried away and 5,000 were ruined by the water, leaving 30,000 people for food. Lower down the embankments of Hidakagown were also destroyed, flooding the cultivated fields and adjacent towns. Out of sixty houses at Wakanomuda, but two remain standing, and more than 50 people lost their lives. An official of the Nisnimura district, who arrived at Wakamoya Aug. 22nd, reports that about 4 p. m. Aug. 19th a sudden rise of the waters took place at Sanabemachi, and in a few minutes the floors of buildings were covered. Many houses were carried away and about

DEPENDENT UPON THE LOCAL OFFICIALS

THREE HUNDRED PERSONS LOST THEIR LIVES.

All the villages within a radius of ten miles were more or less submerged. In Chorairomuta 700 houses were washed away, leaving only 11 buildings standing. Many persons lost their lives in that district. The volume of the river Kinokuni, an adjacent stream, swelled to an extraordinary extent, the rise being in some places 13 to 18 feet. No bridge over the stream could withstand the force of the flood. The river steadily rose from 6 o'clock in the evening until at midnight it began to overflow its embankments, and about four miles from the city of Wakameyo the banks at the village of Iwahashi were washed away. Immediately the village and its whole neighborhood, including 48 other hamlets, were COVERED BY THE RAGING WATERS.

The depth of the flood was from five to fifteen feet. The neighborhood of Osaka also suffered severely. At Osaka relief is being given to several thousand people. The embankments on the Yodogown and Inkedapsigawn rivers were broken at several places August 21st, and considerable damage caused to farms, while many houses were swept away or partially wrecked. In Hongumura 180 houses were washed away and thirty persons drowned. In Higashipo, Murogori and Neship Marogori several hundred houses were demolished and considerable loss of life occurred. In Hidakagoria 380 houses were carried away and 70 houses were damaged, while 120 persons lost their lives and 50 were injured.

FIVE THOUSAND PEOPLE NARROWLY ESCAPED DEATH.

Many houses in Tsechigwara and Shikiya, which are situated close to the Kumanagawa were carried away, and many lives lost. The buildings of the Kumano Shrine, except one or two small temples were swept away, but the sacred image was saved. According to a report from Jeninu in Higashi Murogari, about one-fourth of the buildings (over 500) and 100 persons were swept away. The Hikawga river rose 28 feet, and villages close to the river were flooded. About 150 houses were washed away and many persons perished. Seventy-eight houses and the Miwake police station at Shusan were carried away. Owing to landslides close to the source of the Hidakiwaga vast numbers of trees are uprooted and swept upon the fields, where several thousands are now lying. About 1,200 houses of the village close to the Tomitagawa were swept away and over 500 persons were engulfed. According to investigations made at Wakayamo up to Aug. 26th the number of houses carried away in Nishi-Murogari was 1,092, while 508 others were demolished and 440 were damaged. The number of deaths there was 863. Other villages suffered much, and the number of dead cannot be accurately determined, but for the province of Kii it will not be below 10,000. Bloated bodies and wreckage cover the fields for miles, and it will be months before the survivors can proceed with the work. The loss in money is estimated at $6,000,000. Relief has been sent to the ruined district, but the suffering is intense and in the outlying districts many will die from starvation. The same rain which ruined the western part of the Province of Kii by flood, also wrought a most similar disaster on the eastern section of the same Province. The rivers rose rapidly and the people in the neighborhood of Amanogawa, fearing an inundation, made preparations for the emergency. While they were thus employed the obstructing communication between Tsujido, Mura and Sakamoto Mura, and the waters in the rivers which rose in consequence covered the houses in Tsujido Mura, the people fleeing to the temple on an elevated piece of ground. The mountain of Sugitama, at the back of the temple, suddenly came down in an avalanche, burying the entire village under ground, only the upper half of the temple being left to view. The villages of Nagato Mura, Tanise Mura, Uyenoike Mura and Hayashi Mura, along the Totsugawawgo were all buried under ground by the crumbling away of the Umiyabara Mountain. All the villages of Ui, Nagatorio, Numata Hara and Asahi, at the entrance of the Totsugawago, face each other and can be seen across the river, but there being no boats between these places

MOUNTAINS SUDDENLY CRUMBLED AWAY,

NO HELP COULD BE RENDERED.

The villages of Uyeno, Chi, Takatsu, Kawatsu and several others were all either swept away or buried underground. The number of deaths in these villages has not yet been ascertained, but as all outlets were blockaded the loss of life must have been appalling. The villages of Kaseahaya, Uchihara, Takigawa, Nojori, Yamasaki and Taana were also entirely swept away or buried by the overflow of rivers and the crumbling of mountains. The damage along the lower course of the river and the villages skirting it has not been yet ascertained, but it is supposed that out of fifty villages comprising Totsugawaga, all have suffered more or less from the disaster, and it is doubtful if one has escaped. In all these villages, are supposed to have been nearly or quite destroyed. The exact number of deaths in this small region is not yet known, but the district officials place it between 4,000 and 5,000. The coal mines at Tatezato Mura, and Yoshino Gori also caved in, and forty miners are missing. In Shiono Mura a land slide occurred, crushing to death eight persons, besides which forty are missing who are supposed to have been buried alive. It is impossible to furnish aid to the thousands of sufferers, and many must die of hunger and thirst. The losses in lives and money will never be known, as whole towns have been annihilated, leaving no survivors to tell the story. The wreckage is strewn along the sea coast for ninety miles. The Japanese newspapers think the loss of life does not fall below 15,000.

FARMS, RICE FIELDS AND HOUSES

THE CURRENT FAILED.

An Electric Car Rushes Down an Incline—Many Injured.

A Chattanooga, Tenn., despatch says: A car on the Electric Railroad up Mission Ridge had nearly reached the top on the steep track to-day when the electric current failed. The car at once started down the mountain at great speed. The conductor shouted to the passengers to jump off. The car contained 50 people, visitors to the reunion of the Army of the Cumberland, one-half of the party being ladies. A panic seized the passengers and they began leaping from the car. Five or six persons remained on the car with the conductor and motor man, and all were uninjured, as the car was stopped before reaching the foot of the ridge. Mrs. Mary Adams, of Casey, Ill., who jumped off, struck a pole and was thrown in front of the car, striking on her head, and was thrown to the side of the track, suffering injuries from which she died. William Munford, of Casey, Ill., in jumping from the car struck on a mass of barbed wire and was badly cut, one eye being literally torn out. About ten persons were seriously hurt and some half dozen badly but not dangerously injured.

Fighting a Cotton Ring.

A London cable says: Energetic action is being taken by those employed in the cotton industries to defeat the Liverpool cornerer, who has succeeded in buying up the great bulk of actual cotton which will be on the market at the end of September. As the new crop in any quantity will not be here until the middle of October the cornerer, who is a Dutch Jew, will have the market to himself for three weeks, and if his move is successful will be able to run up the price to his own figure. Both employers and employees have agreed to take joint action in order to defeat the ring. Two-thirds of the mill-owners have decided to run on short time. The remaining third will be unable to work at all, as the Operatives' Union will call out the spinners from all the mills where short time is not run. This will enable the masters to make their present stock last out until the new cotton comes into market, and so leave the cornerer with the whole purchase on his hands.

Big Public Frauds in the South.

A New Orleans despatch says: The investigation by the State officials and parties interested in State securities continues to develop new cases of fraud every day. In addition to the $303,600 of consolidated bonds upon which interest payments have been stopped, and many of which (presumably all) have been surreptitiously put upon the market, instead of being cancelled, there have been discovered in private hands a number of 4 per cent. "constitutional" bonds that are clearly an over-issue made in fraud. The highest legal issue of the $100 series of these bonds is No. 200, yet numbers at least as high as 242 are outstanding; and of the $500 series, the legal limit of which is No. 80, bonds as high as No. 56 are afloat. Opinions differ as to whether ex-State Treasurer Burke is to blame for this state of affairs.

Yacht and Pleasure Party Lost.

A Cleveland, O., despatch says: The steam yacht Leo left Loraine for this port on Sunday afternoon, having on board John B. Tunte, J. D. Lawler, T. P. Ritter, Benjamin Kline, S. D Knight, D. A. Lawler, Capt. Sam Root, Fred Pelow and an engineer from Detroit, name unknown. Nearly all of them we e prominent and well-known business men of Loraine. The yacht was a small one, and had just been purchased at Detroit for $550. She encountered a heavy sea on Sunday night, and was probably lost with all on board near Rocky River. Nothing was learned of the yacht until this morning, when the bodies of Ritter and Lawler were found by the life-saving crew floating in the lake. The remaining bodies are being searched for.

THE LIQUOR TRADE.

How Would it do as a Government Monopoly?

AN AMATEUR GOTHENBURG SYSTEM.

SIR,—It appears to me from the way the Scott Act has been defeated in almost every county where the vote has recently been taken, that the temperance people have made up their minds to abandon it and try other means which they hope may be more successful. Judging from the present attitude of many of the temperance workers, I would infer that they are looking to prohibition as being in their judgment the only remedy now left to them with which successfully to meet the evils of the liquor traffic. This is noticeable in the movement for a third party in this country with prohibition as a principal plank in their platform. I take it then that the present is a proper time to consider whether, after all, prohibition is a practical movement, and if so, how long must we wait for its consummation? On every hand the evils of the liquor traffic are apparent, and efforts are being put forth in many quarters to stem the tide, by reducing the number of licenses and securing the better enforcement of the law. Still the evil goes on, and all that can be said is that, in some respects, it is being held in check. It would now look as if we must be content with a liquor law more or less well administered, while the great tide goes on the same as ever, or till the ultra temperance party succeed in bringing the community to think with them to the extent of enacting a prohibitory law. Well sir, if this is the best that can be done, we should be satisfied, but I for one am not willing to wait so long. It surely becomes every earnest temperance advocate to consider, whether there may not be other methods than prohibition which could be adopted, and which, from their greater fitness to meet the views of all classes of temperance people, could be brought into practical effect within a comparatively short period, and, at the same time, practically serve the same purpose. It is to this point, therefore, that I wish to direct my remarks, and in doing so I have no idea of treating the subject exhaustively, but simply to broadly state my views, with the hope that it may stimulate thought and provoke discussion. I think it will be admitted that if all the temperance people were only united they could get all the necessary legislation they would require; but, in my opinion, the trouble lies just at this point. There are two classes among the temperance people—one which, for convenience, may be termed the extreme or entire prohibitionists, and the other the moderate or anti-prohibitionists. Now, while these two parties, both of which are numerous and respectable, remain divided, there can be no hope of any great and successful achievement in the cause of temperance. To unite these two classes, therefore, should be the great effort, and this can only be done by adopting some method which would fairly meet the views of both. To secure this, we should see at what point they differ, and then try to find a course which, while it might not fully meet the views of the Prohibition party, yet will be such a step in the right direction, if only as a starting point, as to secure their co-operation, and at the same time will be likely to gain the sympathy and support of the more moderate class. It is well known that even in countries where prohibition has been enacted there has been a respectable class of persons who have not been in sympathy with the law, and, consequently, they have in one way or another, given more or less countenance to those who, for gain, were ready to break it, and for the reason that they felt their private rights were infringed, and consequently if they did not actually assist in the illicit traffic, they did not oppose it, as they would otherwise have been disposed to do. My idea is, therefore, that some method should be adopted which, while it would secure to the temperate class of the community the right to procure liquors in an honorable and open way, would on the other hand, provide that those who were intemperate and unable to control themselves could be prohibited; also that the use of liquors would not in any way be promoted, as is now done so effectually under the license system. I may be pardoned in digressing to say that I think it would not be possible in any other way, so effectually to stimulate the consumption of liquors and the drinking habits of the people, as by a high license system. When you grant a license to a party at a high rate to sell liquors, it is simply the broadest intimation you can give that you expect him to sell all he can, and thus secure a return for his money. One of the reasons why I advocate a more moderate scheme, is because of the almost utter impossibility to secure prohibition. I have already mentioned one reason for this, namely, the divided public sentiment, and the other is the difficulty any government must experience in abandoning the revenue derived from the trade. It is all very well to say that the expenses of government would soon be so reduced, through the lessening of crime, as to make up for the loss, but even in the face of some precedents, that has to be tested, and our legislatures would need a good deal of faith to warrant them in trying the experiment. If it is true that public drinking places and the licensed sales shops are so largely responsible for the drinking habits of the people, then it needs no argument to prove that these should be swept away, and any substitute for prohibition must provide for this. It will scarcely be questioned that all classes would unite in doing away with places for the sale of liquors, where the individual's personal interests were involved, provided liquors could be had with reasonable restrictions in some other way. Then the Government would surely be well satisfied with the revenue derived from a trade which was sufficient to meet the normal demands of the people. The plan I would propose, therefore, is to do away with all public drinking places and sales shops, and put the sale of liquors exclusively in the hands of the Government. Let the Government open only as many stores as would be necessary to supply a reasonable demand, putting in their own official, who would have no personal interest in the sales beyond serving the public as any other civil servant in its employ. By this means all sober and proper persons could secure their liquors (but not to be consumed on the premises, of course) without the temptation to perjury or deception, as would be the case under a prohibitory law, and, at the same time, the Government would have it in their power to say who were fit and proper persons to be served, and under what conditions. The Government would have the right and power to charge just such prices for the liquors as they might think right and proper and thus they might receive as much revenue as they do now, while the consumption of liquors would naturally be greatly reduced. By this system the liquors would be in the hands of only two parties, the manufacturer or importer and the Government, and in this way also the purity of the liquors would be assured. As the manufacturer or importer can now only get his goods out of bond as the Government officer permits it, so this same regulation would prevent them selling to any person outside the Government. I would permit the manufacturer to export all he could and the importer to import all he could find a market for from the Government, and I would let the demand from the people for the various brands be the guage or limit of the Government purchases. When the Government's stock of Mr. A's liquors needed to be replenished let them buy from him, and so on with all the other manufacturers and importers. If the Government and manufacturer should find that trade fell off with them, all that could be said would be the demand is fully met, and therefore neither party could complain. This, therefore, is a general statement of the plan I would propose, as I do not think it necessary, at this point, to go into all the details required in the practical working of the scheme. If the principle can be proved to be the true one, the details required in carrying it out practically can easily enough be wrought out. Such a plan would not be found to absolutely free the country from all the evils which might arise from the too free use of liquors in the homes, but the same can possibly be said of entire prohibition. With the sale of liquors placed in the hands of the Government alone, you make the Government responsible for the welfare of the people—the same as the head of the household is responsible for the welfare of his family, consequently it would soon become apparent what restrictions would be necessary in supplying the public. It might be well at the same time to consider the propriety of placing the sale of tobacco in the same hands, and thus secure a large revenue from that source also. In talking this matter over with friends I am told that in one or two of the smaller countries in Europe the Government controls the sale of liquor and tobacco, and that it works well. If that is the fact then we have some precedents for this plan, but personally I am not familiar with the facts.

ANTI-SALOON.

PRINCE ALBERT, who now succeeds the late Prince of Monaco, is a man who is known to the world mainly on account of his craze on the subject of the Gulf Stream and also by reason of the extraordinary circumstances which brought his marriage to a close in 1880. Born in 1848, he was married in September, 1869, at the Tuileries, in Paris, to Lady Mary Victoria, the only daughter of the late Duke of Hamilton. The late Duchess of Hamilton was a Princess of the house of Baden, and as such related through the Beauharnais to the Bonapartes. The marriage between Prince Albert and Lady Mary was arranged by Napoleon III. A few days after the marriage Princess Mary left her husband suddenly, never to return. The reason which led her to adopt this extraordinary course has remained a deep mystery to the world at large, and is only known to a few persons, including the King and Queen of the Belgians, the Pope and a few other great personages. It is worthy of note, however, that popular sympathy was altogether on the side of Lady Mary, and that her husband has been cold-shouldered ever since by those in a position to know the true facts in the case. Lady Mary shortly afterwards commenced proceedings at the Vatican with a view to obtaining the annulment of the marriage, on the grounds (the only ones publicly given) that she had been forced into contracting the alliance against her will. A special committee of five cardinals was appointed by the Pontiff to consider the case. After numerous delays and discussions extending over a term of ten years, the marriage was finally annulled on January 3rd, 1880, the son, however, who was born within the first year after the wedding being expressly declared to be of legitimate birth. Lady Mary has since married the well-known Hungarian magnate and sportsman, Count Tassilo Festetico, and entertained the Prince of Wales at her superb country seat in Hungary last year.

TALE OF AN ESQUIMAU.

An Esquimau sat on a chunk of ice,
In the land of the Northern Pole;
He cracked his heels and he whistled twice
At a sight that alarmed his soul.

For a stranger came over the fields of snow,
At a speed that was fearful, quite;
His cheeks were pallid and thin with woe
And the frost on his beard was white.

"Oh, prithee, pause," cried the Esquimau
"From whence do you come so fast?"
"I come from a land weary leagues below
This realm with its storm and blast.

I come from a land in the far off South,
And I've travelled ten thousand miles
Since last the sun like a beaming mouth
Turned loose on the earth his smiles.

A sick man expressed a desire for some apple dumplings, and his wife made a dozen. A little son sat by the bedside watching the dumplings disappear one by one. After a eleven had been devoured the boy said: "Pa, can I have a dumpling?" And the invalid, biting into the last of the toothsome delicacies, said: "Go away, my son; your father is sick."

A BACTERIAL DISEASE.

More Misery for the Farmer—New Thing in Corn Pests.

Professor Burrill has detected a new bacterial disease of Indian corn which shows itself first in a dwarfed condition of the young plants over areas varying in size from a few square rods to an acre or more. After the tassels are formed, the disease may be found scattered throughout the field in single plants; the affected stalks, and especially their lower leaves, being yellow and smaller than the healthy ones. In anything like severe cases, at least half of the roots are injured and often dead, the lower portion of the stalk will be found dead or dying, and presenting a dark color when split. The disease organisms are found in great numbers on and within the affected parts, in many cases collected in gelatinous masses consisting of the bacteria held together by a stiff mucilaginous substance which they exude. Too little is known of the disease to suggest any remedy, but, as it is probable that the germs live through the winter in the soil, the young corn would be liable to suffer more if planted in a field where the disease had prevailed the year before. It is noted that the disease is usually the worst where corn has succeeded corn. The disease is a very prevalent one, and may have existed for a long time. It is not always destructive enough to attract attention, but not infrequently it occasions very serious loss. —Garden and Forest.

The Art of Neat Dressing.

After seeing a fair woman in the dress which most suits her you no more wish to see her in any other than to see an oriole in pink or a robin in parrot green. When women learn the art of dress they will need much less in the way of outfitting than they do now—changes for the season, that is all. It is your cheap, pronounce, ill-chosen gowns, less fit than fashionable, which one tires of soon; and, if women did but know it, there is but one style becoming to each one of them, which brings out her good points and suppresses poor ones, which we should be glad to see her in continually. Mary Stuart had fifty grand dresses, stiff with gold and minever, and shot with rubies and pearls as a modern gown is with jet, but who ever wishes to think of her in any costume but that of her picture, the black velvet gown fitting easily the supple figure, the transparent cuffs and ruff of point lace, the net of pearls and the white veil. She being a beautiful, graceful woman could do with a wardrobe of few dresses, compared with the royal frump Elizabeth Regina, who had 3,000 toilets, some of which, we are told, exist to this day. But she needed something gorgeous to take people's eyes from her black teeth, as she told one of her counselors. Good looks are an economy.—Shirley Dare.

Double Murder and Attempted Suicide.

A Philipsburg, Pa., despatch of Sunday says: W. Seely Hopkins, aged 25, has engaged in numerous quarrels with his wife during the past two or three months. Two weeks ago he left home, returning yesterday. They had another quarrel this morning, in the course of which Hopkins pulled a revolver and shot his wife dead. This occurred on the first floor of their home. The frenzied man then rushed to the third story, where his mother-in-law was, and shot her, too, killing her instantly. Hopkins afterward left the house and went to a livery stable, where he attempted to kill himself, firing two shots at his head with his revolver, neither doing much damage, however, beyond ploughing a couple of grooves in the top of his skull. He confessed to killing his wife and her mother to Dr. Pierce, who pronounced him out of danger. Jealousy and a belief in the faithlessness of his wife are the supposed reasons that incited Hopkins to commit the crime.

Two New York electric light linemen, Henry Freeman and John Neil, were knocked from the pole where they were at work Saturday, and the latter had his skull fractured and may die. Freeman was also badly hurt. An electric shock caused the men to fall.

At Saturday's session of the International Cigar Manufacturer's Convention the report of the committee on strikes was read. During the past two years 160 strikes occurred and $53,687 was expended. Eighty strikes were successful and seventeen were compromised.

Wm. Emery, jun., was found dead on Friday near his home in the northern part of Marmora. It is supposed that he was shot by some unknown party, but it has not as yet been ascertained whether it was done purposely or accidentally. An inquest will be held.

Arthur Lynchberry, of South Dorchester has instituted proceedings against J. A. Dunn, farmer, of the same township claiming $1,000 damages for the seduction of his daughter Minnie. No less than four cases of this character are entered for trial at the Elgin Assizes.

On Saturday Wm. Turnbull, Patrick Sheedy and Wm. Leader were before the Galt Police Magistrate on remand, charged with committing an assault on Elizabeth Richardson on Saturday night. The evidence went to show that the girl had been pretty badly used. The Magistrate refused bail and sent the three prisoners for trial.

HIGH PRICED LOTS.

Where Land is Sold per Square Foot.

The New York Herald says: Smith Ely, jun., and Jefferson M. Levy have returned to New York after an extended European trip. These two gentlemen have for a number of years past co-operated in the purchase and sale of city properties. They naturally, when abroad, had their eyes wide open, and Mr. Jefferson M. Levy said: "We have not at all come up to the values which London properties command. There was a sale there recently of a parcel containing fifty square feet to the London County Bank, almost opposite the Bank of England. That property sold at a figure equal to $625,000 for what we designate a lot of 25x100. In fact there is no such thing as a real estate market there, and whenever anything is sold at all it goes by the square foot, as from £25 to £30 per foot. Investors also who make a business of renting property are perfectly satisfied with the 2 per cent. they are now earning on their investments. Yet all of these people carefully watch the progress of this country, and year by year more of their money will be planted in the American soil."

That Deadly Scourge:

Tubercular consumption is simply lung-scrofula—the active and dangerous development of a taint in the blood. The grand blood-cleansing botanic principles contained in Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery specially fit it to purify the blood, and prevent the formation of ulcers in the lungs and bronchial tubes. Liver complaint, skin diseases, and sores, are also cured by it. All druggists.

A Consistent Service.

Doctor—It's nothing but an attack of dyspepsia.

Patient—And what does that come from?

Doctor—That comes from the Greek, madam.

No matter whether it comes from the Greek or the Hebrew, or eating mince pie, if you have it, just take Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets, and you won't need to ask the doctor anything about it. Specific in all derangements of the liver, stomach and bowels.

Mr. Newman (of Salt Lake City)—Only partially, Miss Gushing. Three of my wives are still living.

Parlor Street Cars.

There is a possibility that Pullman parlor street cars will be running on the Traction company's Market street and Columbia avenue lines before long. The Traction syndicate is considering plans for establishing such a service on the South and West Side cable lines in Chicago, and if the results shall be satisfactory there Philadelphia will, without doubt, get a taste of the new luxury. The intention of the company is to have the cars handsomely fitted up and fixed on double trucks. An extra fare of five cents will be levied, but no more passengers will be admitted than can be comfortably seated. For those who have a long distance to ride, the Pullman car will have every attraction, and it is thought that many will gladly pay the additional five cents.—Philadelphia Record.

Briggs—"I had a dickens of a time today, I tell you." Braggs—"What was it?" Briggs—"Just for fun I shook my fist at a blind beggar across the street and he chased me three blocks up an alley before I could get away."—Terre Haute Express.

A Chicago paper says the danger line is passed as regards the corn crop. Not at all. The danger line will only be reached when the corn is manufactured into whiskey.

THE INVENTO

"Keep still and stop your fidgeting and listen now, my son.
This story of good Joshua is only just begun."
"Don't like it," crossly said the boy, kept in against his will,
"Cause he's the man who first invented making sons stand still."

The while he works his iron jaw."

Two more of Grand Trunk Yardmaster Walker's children died yesterday at London from diphtheria, and another one was stricken down with the terrible malady. A week ago Mr. Walker's seven children were well and hearty, but in that time four of them have died and two others are still very low. The disease was first contracted by one of the younger daughters and brought into the home, but she is now on a fair way to recovery.

Kimberley.

From our other Correspondent.

Our little village has not been represented in your columns for some time, and it is really a pity that such an enterprising place as this is should be passed by unnoticed.

Kimberley is improving very rapidly. Two very nice buildings have already arisen, and the third is growing.

Inspector Grier visited the school a few days ago and pronounced it very much improved "since his last visit," more so than could be expected, considering the disadvantages arising from having two divisions in the same room.

Miss Aggie Kay, of the Queen City, is the guest of Mr. Thos. Wickens.

While Mr. Ellis's girls were after their cows, they ran across old bruin. A hunting party, composed of the miller and the J. P. started after him, but his bearship, not wishing to be caught by the limb of the law, made himself scarce.

Kimberley is booming at present. Building is the order of the day with the business men here.

Mr. William Best, who has been in the threshing business for the past few years, has invested in a new steam "Wide-awake" threshing machine, and is now turning out wheat at a lively rate.

Mr. Sherwood has lately burned his brick kiln, but the result is not very favorable; however, he has a very good pile.

Mr. C. Knott has been improving his already handsome residence by having it veneered with brick. He has now a good gang of men on and expects to soon have it completed.

Our genial postmaster and storekeepor, Mr. Hammond, is intent on building a new dwelling house. He has now a number of men working on the stone wall, upon which he will erect the dwelling next spring.

Mr. McKenzie has caught the building fever also. He is now getting ready to erect a fine, solid brick dwelling, elegant in construction and beautiful in design. Mr. Sherwood's brick kiln will soon be exhausted if this fever continues.

Mr. Thomas Lewis, an old resident of Kimberley, who has been living in Toronto for the last few years, has moved again to Kimberley where he intends to pitch his canvas for the present. He is now doing good work in the carpentering line as house builder.

Mr. George Proctor has erected a new dwelling, where he intends moving into presently. This is one of the buildings on which Mr. Lewis is showing his handiwork.

Mr. A. Aldous, has sold his farm to Mr. William Scott. Mr. A. intends quitting this section of country to seek his welfare elsewhere.

Miss Fogarty, of Churchville, who has been rusticating in this pretty village for the past few weeks at the residence of Mr. Howell, returned home last week. On the eve before departure her many friends here made a taffy pull for the purpose of giving her a pleasant send off. A very pleasant evening was whiled away, and many a straggler could be seen "homeward plodding his weary way when the birds were singing in the morning."

The new Union Hall is at a standstill at present, but we expect to see it finished ere long.

Mr. James Stewart showed a large lot of live stock and farm produce at East Grey fall show, and was successful in bringing home a goodly number of reds and blues.

Mr. Bishop has decided to remain in this burg for a while yet. His old friends and patrons welcome this decision with joy. Mr. Bishop is too valuable a citizen to lose, and it is hoped he will continue his abode in our flourishing village for a long time to come.

Artemesia Fall Show.

A very successful show, considering all things, was that held at Priceville on Thursday of last week. The morning was very wet, but as midday approached the downpour ceased and people began to arrive in quantity at the historical old burg of Priceville, where Mr. M. Riley had gratuitously offered his carriage shop for the display of roots, grains, ladies' work, manufactures, etc. Live stock was exhibited on the school grounds, and was above the average in excellence. The show of horse flesh was especially fine, in fact we do not remember ever seeing a better show of yearling and two-year-old colts than that shown. The two-year-olds, twelve in number, were especially noteworthy. In cattle there were also some fine animals, Mr. L. Frook of Proton, and Mr. Sullivan, of Glenelg, showing two magnificent Durham bulls, the latter's animal tipping the scales at 1585 pounds. In other classes the show was fully up to the average. The inside exhibits were also slightly in advance of former years, if anything. Mr. G. F. Chapman, of Durham, showed a fine collection of photographs. Mr. Chapman does good work, and as he says himself, his "prices are right."

Our good looking brother quill-driver, Mr. Mitchell, of the Durham Chronicle, was present in all his glory. He is unmarried, and the young ladies present appeared to know it.

Mr. Brodie was kept hustling until a late hour attending to entries.

After the show the directors had a supper at the Crown Hotel, to which The Advance had the honor of an invitation. Strict justice was done to the good things provided, after which a meeting of directors was held to discuss the question of a plowing match. It was decided to hold one on Friday, October 18th, and committees were appointed to select a field, etc.

BALTIC PRISONERS COMMITTED.

Backhaus and Peilch Sent for Trial—Russell and Trip Refused Bail.

An Owen Sound despatch says: A. G. Campbell, purser of the steamer Baltic, gave evidence as follows: We had a deck hand who was lost on the 26th of August. I understand his name was Charles Hambly; that name appears on our books. The first I heard of this disturbance was from the first engineer. This was some time after it had occurred. It was called tarring and feathering. I did not see the boy. I got no order to pay him off. The watchman came and tapped at my office window. He told me there was a hand there going ashore at Wiarton and wanted his money. I asked his name and the watchman replied, "He says his name is Charles Owens." I reached down for my crew list book and while doing so I heard the splash. I have a distinct recollection of the occurrences and of Mr. Currie's words. After the splash the cry "man overboard" was raised. I feel satisfied that the boy who gave us his name as Charles Hambly was the boy who was lost.

Mr. Frost then questioned Mr. Campbell as to the way the Crown witnesses attached to the boat had been paid since their detention. Mr. Campbell explained that McMillan, Rogers and Backhaus had been paid off.

Witness—When I heard the shout I ran out of my office aft on the main deck and threw the life buoy over. When I was returning, and just passing in front of the office, I met the captain going aft on the main deck. I heard him saying to a man, "Go up there and see if they are lowering a boat," or some words to that effect. I distinctly heard the captain give that order. I am not positive where the captain went after giving the order, but I think forward. There was more or less confusion, as there always is in a case of this kind. The captain would be just in front of the steward's office when he ordered the man up and was passing aft.

This closed the case for the Crown, and the Crown Attorney said he did not consider any argument on his part necessary to convince their Worships after what they had heard. Mr. Creasor, on behalf of Peilch, argued for bail, but the Magistrates held that from the evidence it appeared plainly that in law all the prisoners were equally guilty, whether they aided by personal effort the perpetrators of the outrage or whether they only abetted it by lending their presence at its committal. It made no legal difference. The two prisoners were therefore remanded to jail to await their trial at the next Assizes.

Chief Justice Galt, after considering the application made to him to bail the prisoners yesterday committed for trial in connection with the Baltic outrage, gave his decision yesterday. He ordered bail in the sum of $400 for each of the two boys Daggett and McFadyen, who are each to find two sureties for $200 each, but he refused the application for bail for Russell and Tripp, who will therefore remain in jail till 9th November, when Chief Justice Armour will go up to Owen Sound to hold the Assizes.

IN MOLTEN IRON.

The Bottom of a Blast Furnace Gives Way With Frightful Results.

A Braddock, Pa., despatch of Friday says: At Carnegie's Edgar Thompson steel works last night Captain W. R. Jones, general manager of the works, and a number of workmen were horribly and perhaps fatally burned. Furnace "C," one of the largest blast furnaces, had not been working properly, and Captain Jones called this evening to see if he could not ascertain the cause. He was working with a number of men near the base of the furnace when the bottom gave way. In an instant flames of fire shot forth, and the hot metal exploded and fell like sheets of water. Tons of the metal poured out of the furnace, and that any person near it escaped instant death is remarkable. The injured are: Captain Jones, horribly burned; Michael Quinn, aged 25, so badly burned that his flesh peeled off with his clothes. He can only live a few hours; John Makake, badly burned about body but not fatally; Capt. Ned Quinn, burned about arms and chest, will recover; Patrick Hughes, Michael Connor and John Needan. The last three may not recover.

LATER.—Capt. Jones, the physicians now say, will recover, and his face will not be disfigured. Two of the others will die.

Burglars Make a Big Haul.

An Inwood, Mich., despatch of Sunday says: Burglars on Friday night entered the Iron Exchange Bank and stole $44,000 from the vault. The money was a special deposit from the Ashland Iron Company, and was placed there after banking hours on Friday night. There is no clue to the robbers. The door of the vault had not been marred, and it was opened by some one who had learned the combination. There were only two men supposed to be in possession of it—Cashier Reynolds and Assistant Cashier Leonard Perrin.

The exact amount stolen was $39,895. The robbers were evidently in too much of a hurry to take small silver and $1,805 was left behind. The United States Express Company is the loser of the money. They did not deposit it in the bank, but merely left it there for safe keeping over night, when it would be delivered to the consignee, Manager William P. Lyon, of the Ashland and Germania mines. It is likely that the Express Company will announce a heavy reward for the apprehension of the burglars.

Fatal Railway Collision.

A Worcester, Mass., despatch says: Two freight trains collided early yesterday morning on the Boston & Maine Railroad, between Lancaster and South Lancaster. Engineer Edward Lawrence, of Rochester, had his left arm broken. Fireman Warren was killed and Peter Trapo was injured about the head. The cars, thirteen in number, were piled on top of each other. The engines were totally ruined.

Patti will remain at Craig-y-Nos, Wales until October 21st, when she goes to London. She will sing in eight concerts, two in London and six in the Provinces, for which she is to receive $28,000 and all expenses paid. She will leave Liverpool for New York on November 23rd. She is to sing in this country, Canada and Mexico.

THE ROTTERDAM STRIKE.

The Men Generally Well-behaved.—Negotiations for Settlement.

A Rotterdam cable of Sunday says: Everything was quiet in the vicinity of the docks yesterday. The police are protecting the comparatively few men employed on the wharves, and are backed by troops, who occupy positions enabling them to quell in a very short time any disturbance that may arise.

The labor troubles are increasing at Rotterdam, and the immense shipping business of that port has for the time being been transferred to Amsterdam. The movement is in the nature of a lockout, so far as the original strikers are concerned, but the strike is nevertheless certain to spread, and will probably extend to Amsterdam. The chances of its success are by no means as good as were the chances of the London strikers, as those of Rotterdam have very little, if any, public sympathy; neither are they favored with the good will of the police, as was the case in London.

Thus far very few acts of violence have been reported, but the people of Hull, England, were treated to a sensation to-day, which gives evidence of the existence at the Dutch port of a spirit of violence among the strikers which the authorities have failed to note. A few days ago a steamer sailed from Hull for Rotterdam, and reached her destination after the strike took place. She was unable to discharge her cargo, and finally cast off from her dock and returned to Hull. Upon her arrival home the body of a Rotterdam Customs officer was found in her hold. An inquest was held, and in the absence of full testimony the coroner's jury returned a verdict of accidental death, though there is very little doubt that the dead official was the victim of exasperated strikers.

The masters have consented to negotiate with the striking dockmen. All is quiet in the neighborhood of the docks to-night.

THE SITUATION IN FRANCE.

Three Prominent Statesmen Give the Public their Opinions.

A Paris cable says: Gen. Boulanger has issued an address to the electors of Montmartre, in which he says they have replied to the iniquitous charges of the Senate by electing him to the Chamber. The Government, finding its trickery of no effect, had resorted audaciously to the annulling of votes. This the General declares, was an act of sheer brigandage. The rights of the electors and their privileges had been trampled under foot. The Republicans ought to see that the rights of the voters were respected.

President Carnot received the members of the Commercial Congress to-day. In a speech he referred to the happy result of the elections. He said the destinies of Republican France were now assured. It behoved the Chamber to attend less to speculative politics and to devote themselves to practical business and pacific developments.

M. Ferry, who was defeated in the recent elections for member of the Chamber of Deputies, has written a letter to the electors of the District of the Vosges, in which he ran, saying that violence, dishonesty and corruption disorganized for the moment the Republicans of the district, but that such a state of affairs cannot last long. His defeat, he says, is of small consequence. He will remain on the battlefield until the coalition against the Government is broken.

Mexico Disturbed by Storms.

A St. Louis despatch says: Advices from Mexico say very heavy storms have been sweeping over that country since August 15th, visiting different States at different times. The latest prevailed along the Pacific coast, and reports from Mazatlan and Manzanillo are that the steamers Porferio Diaz and Alatta have probably been wrecked. After a five days' steady rain in the State of Vera Cruz, a cyclone passed over the town of Chipintipec, causing great destruction, and to add to the terror of the inhabitants a great land slide occurred on the mountain back of the town, a part of which passed directly through the town, cutting a great swath through the buildings and carrying away everything in its path. A torrent of water then poured down the gully made by the land slide and flooded that part of the place not already destroyed. There was no loss of life.

Almost Driven to Cannibalism.

An Auckland despatch gives the following: The Tonga steamer Wainui has brought here the captain and crew of the British ship Garston, which foundered in mid-ocean. The shipwrecked sailors were 22 days in an open boat without food or water. On the 22nd day the men, driven to desperation by hunger and thirst, decided that one of their number must be sacrificed to save the lives of the others. They were casting lots to see who should be the victim when they sighted Wallis Island. The natives of the island assisted the exhausted men to land and treated them most kindly. A mission boat took them to Tonga.

Quebec Universities Win.

A Montreal despatch of Sunday says: The universities of this Province have won a victory. Yesterday the Bar Council of the Province voted, by a considerable majority, to accept holders of university degrees for entrance to the study of law without a preliminary examination. This privilege has been hitherto refused by the Bar Council, and last session legislation was sought by McGill University to overcome the narrow-minded view of the Bar Council. The Bill passed the Assembly by a large majority, but was killed in the Legislative Council. The Bar having capitulated, it is presumed legislation will be unnecessary.

Tuey Gwok Ying, the new Chinese Minister to the United States, is a good looking man, about 50 years of age. He dresses in the finest silk raiment and spends a great deal of money. He is a constant smoker, and when he is not puffing a cigarette is rolling one. His present visit to Washington will not be a long one, as he is accredited to Spain and Peru, and will soon set out for Madrid.

A KINGSTON SUICIDE.

Suffering from Melancholia a Laborer's Wife Takes Paris Green.

A Kingston despatch of Friday says: Mrs. Jas. Howie, wife of a stone breaker in the township of Kingston, committed suicide yesterday by taking Paris green. She was respectable and religious, but because of a serious ailment she frequently became melancholy. Yesterday she discovered Paris green in the house, and, sending the children to the shed, she mixed a draught and drank it. She grew sick and the children ran for her niece, Miss Guy Howie. She found Mrs. Howie gasping for breath. An old cloth which Miss Howie saw in Mrs. Howie's room had contained Paris green. When Miss Howie picked it up she said: "Mrs. Howie, you have been taking Paris green." Although dying she said she had not drank any of the stuff, but that as she was handling a bundle of clothing containing green some of it got down her throat. Miss Howie knew that was impossible. She questioned the woman very closely, and at last she said she had drank Paris green, but would not give any reason. Miss Howie said to her, "I thought you always wanted to go to heaven." "So I do," replied the poor woman. Miss Howie added: "You are liable to go to another place now." Before the neighbors were summoned and after she had taken the drug she remarked to the children: "Uncle Jimmie," meaning her husband, "does not like me now." Miss Howie said she attended Mrs. Howie a few days ago while she was in a melancholy spell. After she came to Miss Howie found an open razor under her bed. She told the girl that she had intended to cut her throat. The girl kept this quiet because Mrs. Howie had bound her to secrecy.

GERMAN WAR TALK.

Complications Growing Out of Royal Visits—Bismarck's Future.

A Berlin cable says: The Cologne Gazette ridicules the gossip about the appointment of a successor to Prince Bismarck. The Chancellor, it says, is still powerful enough to protect his rights and defend himself against the attacks of unauthorized persons. No statesmen or military man, it declares, has any idea of replacing Bismarck.

The Berlin papers assert that the fresh complications respecting the Czar's visit to Berlin, by which that event is indefinitely delayed, are due to the fact that Emperor William contemplates a visit to Constantinople while on his way to Athens to attend the marriage of his sister, Princess Sophie, to the Crown Prince of Greece. Whether the Russian Emperor objects to the Kaiser's visit to the Sultan or merely wishes to postpone his own visit until the rulers of Germany and Turkey have concluded their conference, is not stated.

The week has been signalized by an outbreak of the war clamor by the semi-official press, based on the extension of the Russian strategic railways and movements of Russian troops on the frontiers of Galicia and Bukovina. Prince Bismarck is credited with instigating this agitation, both in order to constrain the Czar to grant him a political conference, to baulk Russian efforts, to obtain a loan, and to prepare the Reichstag to accept a new military Bill appropriating 240,000,000 marks. The Czar is annoyed over Emperor William's projected visit to Constantinople.

UNWELCOME VISITORS.

A Smallpox Infected Party Travel From New York to Chicago.

A Sunday's Chicago despatch says: John Welter, aged 14, the son of wealthy parents, is ill here with smallpox. The family returned from Europe recently. They embarked at Havre, where, smallpox being reported, John was vaccinated. The party passed quarantine at New York and started west on a Delaware & Lackawanna train. An eruption was noticed on the boy's face, but it was supposed to be a case of measles. At Buffalo they changed and took a Michigan Central train and arrived here on the 25th inst. A physician was called and in a couple of days concluded the lad's disease was smallpox. All the school children in the vicinity are being vaccinated. There is no doubt that hundreds of persons between New York and Chicago have been exposed to the disease. No attempt was made to isolate it in Chicago for two days, and in the meantime the boy had travelled the streets and come in contact with many persons.

Rafting on an Extensive Scale.

An Ottawa despatch says: The articles of incorporation of the Joggins Raft Company, which is to handle Canadian and American timber on the Pacific, have been filed. The company start on a paid-up capital of $300,000, with a reserve of over double that amount. Col. J. M. Donahue, of the San Francisco & Northern Pacific Company, and J. D. Spreckles, two of the largest capitalists of the Pacific coast, are backing the scheme. The company will build rafts of 8,000,000 to 12,000,000 feet, making them as large as consistent with the season. These rafts will be towed by tugs to San Francisco, where the mills will be situated. The entire cost of construction of an 8,000,000 foot raft will, it is said, not exceed $15,000. This means an enormous saving, and a freight rate of approximately $2 per thousand feet. This will enable the company to place lumber much cheaper on the market than at present, and undersell all the old lumber companies.

The Hidden Danger Was Great.

A Milwaukee despatch says: The startling information is made public that a great catastrophe during the National Encampment was averted by mere chance. The sloping hillside at Juneau Park, where 100,000 people were seated on the night of the sham naval battle, has moved six inches. Had it not been for the stone roadbed of the railway at the foot of the hill, the whole side of the bluff would have slipped into the lake, carrying the people with it. The ground at the bottom of the hill is bulged, and at the top there is a deep fissure where the sod and earth have been torn apart. Before the seats were erected many civil engineers had doubts about the safety of the bank.

KEMP SUCCUMBS.

The Long-Imprisoned Landslide Victim Dead—More Bodies Found.

A Quebec despatch of Wednesday night says: The rejoicing caused by the escape of Mr. Joseph Kemp was short-lived. He expired shortly after 11 o'clock yesterday evening. When first taken out of the ruins he seemed so strong, in spite of his age and sufferings, that great hopes were entertained of his ultimate recovery. Towards 3 p.m., however, the reaction made itself felt. He sank rapidly and died without a struggle. It was a great consolation to him to see before his death his son, Mr. J. W. Kemp, of Portland, who immediately returned to Quebec on hearing of the dreadful accident.

Harry Black was buried yesterday. This morning the body of Mrs. O'Dowd and this afternoon those of Mr. and Mrs. Henry were carried to the grave.

The sad search was continued throughout the day, and the bodies of Mr. and Mrs. Maybury discovered. The latter was so much disfigured that the workmen hesitated before touching an object so inexpressibly horrible. The corpse had been partly eaten by rats. Richard Maybury, over 60 years old, was a British veteran, enjoying a pension of one shilling sterling per day. At the beginning of his career as a soldier he went through the Crimean campaign and retired covered with medals and decorations, which he proudly wore when marching in the ranks of the gallant 8th. He will be given a military funeral to-morrow. The firing party will consist of 21 men of the 8th Royal Rifles, under command of the Color-Sergeant of Maybury's company. Detachments of "B" Battery, the School of Cavalry and all the local volunteer corps will attend. It will be the sixth military funeral which has taken place in Quebec since the month of May.

The other two children of Michael Bradley were found late last night. According to the best authorities there is now only one body missing, that of Tom Pemberton, Kemp's adopted son. It is expected that his body will be found to-morrow. His funeral will be the last sad act of this dreadful tragedy.

Rain has been falling in torrents for 16 hours, and it is feared that this will open up the remaining fissure and produce a second landslide. This would be rather advantageous than otherwise, as nobody is now living beneath the dangerous portion of the rock. It seems that the military authorities hold this opinion, as orders have been given to fire the noon and 9.30 o'clock guns as usual. It will be remembered that this had been discontinued as long as there was hope of saving lives among the ruins. It is also rumored that another fissure has opened on the face of the rock. The City Engineer has, however, not heard of it.

The Coroners' inquest was continued to-day. Most of the witnesses heard were questioned as to the manner in which the search had been conducted. So far it appears that on the first night the work was done by the soldiers and by volunteers from all parts of the city. On all the succeeding days the corporation foremen were in command, and kept continually on the ground relays of from 30 to 40 men. It is to the credit of the Mayor and of several Councillors, especially Councillor McLaughlin, that things were done systematically and as promptly as could be expected under the circumstances. Dr. Parke testified that had the ruins been cleared in 24 hours, more lives might have been saved, but this was a manifest impossibility. Of course, as must be expected, the usual ill-feeling and bickerings to which disasters of this kind invariably give rise have begun to make themselves felt. To an impartial observer it will be evident that, apart from the unavoidable confusion and dismay which followed the first shocking news, all that could have been done has been done to save life. Such is the opinion of Father McCarthy, of St. Patrick's, who was questioned on the subject.

A Miner's Little Nap.

The Sun's Wilkesbarre (Pa.) special says A Hungarian at Rock Glen has just awakened from a fourteen days' sleep. About eight weeks ago he started on a spree and drank eight gallons of the worst liquor in the coal region. He then dropped into a stupor, and for seven days lay in the bush. At the end of that time he was found by the overseer of the poor and carried into a shanty near the railroad. Here the fellow slept until last Friday. He was visited by the people in the neighborhood, but all efforts to awake him failed. A physician examined him and found that his circulation was all right, and that his pulse registered 64. Friday the Hungarian awoke and walked down to the hotel, where he took his morning "bracer."

Fighting the Cotton Corner.

A Blackburn, Eng., cable of Tuesday night says: To-night at a special representative meeting of the operative cotton spinners of Blackburn and district, the following important resolution respecting the cotton corner was passed: "That this meeting agrees, in case the masters refuse to stop their mills for a fortnight in October, to assist in defeating the cotton corner, and that the operatives of all the mills shall be brought out by this association, and be paid by the amalgamation." A resolution was also passed recommending the spinners to hold shop meetings and decide to stop, and a mass meeting will be held on Friday to consider the question again.

The Daily Smash-up.

A Chicago despatch of Tuesday says: The Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific passenger train which left the main depot at 8.35 p.m. to-day for Blue Island was run into by a freight train at the Lake Shore & Panhandle crossing, near Eighty-Seventh street, Englewood. The passenger train was at a standstill, one coach projecting over the crossing. Into this coach, containing about sixty persons, plunged the freight train, travelling rapidly at right angles to the Rock Island track. The wreck of the passenger coach was complete. The list of the killed is: Mrs. Kelley, J. McKinsie, Fred. Huffner, Mrs. Brown and an unknown woman, all of Washington Heights. Those most seriously injured are: Gus Mulcahy, Chicago, fatally hurt; Miss A. K. Steele, Anton Thuberg and Parker Harden, of Washington Heights. Several others sustained slight injuries.

THE NORTHWEST.

The residence of Thos Rooks, at Brandon, was entered by burglars and goods valued at $300 were stolen.

The special train conveying the viceregal party ran at the rate of 45 miles per hour between Rat Portage and Winnipeg.

The funeral of Mrs. Hayter Reed, the wife of the Indian Commissioner, took place to-day. She died on Monday from inflammation of the bowels. On Friday last she was at a ball.

Nearly 100 miles of the Regina & Long Lake road are already graded, and it is believed Saskatoon will be reached this fall.

Track-laying on the Souris extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway began to-day.

In 1877 and 1878, the "grasshopper years," the Dominion Government made advances for seed grain to a number of settlers of the Red River district, taking mortgages for the same. Two or three thousand of these mortgages are still in existence, and now, under the Torrens system, it is found they constitute a cloudy title. An effort is being made to secure a settlement.

A man named Masoch has been arrested at St. Boniface on a charge of robbing Langlois' butcher shop of $610 in bills. It is also said he is suspected of robbing one Jean of $1,000.

Lord Stanley and party visited St. Boniface this morning.

Mr. and Mrs. McVicar, Miss McIntosh and Miss Graham, of Toronto, Presbyterian missionaries to China, arrived to-day and proceeded west to Vancouver. They were met at the station by a number of Presbyterian friends.

The Governor-General and party went out to Stonewall to-day and opened the annual Fall Fair of the Rockwood Agricultural Society. An address was presented from the Municipal Council at Stony Mountain. An excellent view of the herd of buffalo was had.

Alex. McDonald, contractor for the Northwest Central, arrived from Ottawa on to-day's train. To-morrow he will go on to Brandon, where work has already been begun, in order to connect the new road with the Canadian Pacific.

John Gunn, of Gonor, has finally decided to be a candidate for the representation of Kildonan in the Legislature.

While making arrangements at Stonewall to fire a salute for his Excellency, wind blew a spark into the powder and an explosion followed, seriously injuring a man named McLean and his young son. The father's face is badly disfigured, and the boy has some bones broken.

The residents of Swift Current witnessed a remarkable and unusual sight at about 8.40 last evening, when a meteor was observed in the heavens of sufficient brightness in a clear starry sky to render objects as visible as by a good moon. It lasted for a period of about three seconds and was traveling in a northwest direction. The report of an explosion which resembled that of a cannon fired at a considerable distance was heard about two minutes after the disappearance of the body.

A special train with European emigrants on board arrived last night.

The city engineer is going to Ottawa to submit plans for the Assiniboine water scheme for the approval of the Government.

A representative of Sir Thomas Brassey, one of the wealthiest members of the English aristocracy, is expected to arrive here to-day or to morrow to complete the purchase of certain large interests in Northwest lands, to be used for colonization purposes. The idea is to erect cottages and start new colonists in life.

The rails for fifty miles of the Northwest Central will arrive at Brandon to-morrow. Track-laying begins immediately, and building operations will be renewed at the earliest possible moment next spring.

R. Campion, the Conservative candidate in Dennis, has withdrawn, and Hon. Mr. McLean, the new Provincial Secretary, will doubtless be declared elected by acclamation to-morrow. In his letter of resignation Mr. Campion says: "I find in a personal canvass of part of Dennis that the Liberal Conservative party, while not in any way approving of the past record of the Greenway Government, and especially of Hon. Mr. McLean's vote on the railway question, are anxious to see if the present Administration will carry out the policy in reference to the dual language and Separate Schools questions, foreshadowed by Hon. Mr. Martin in the speech at Portage la Prairie, and that the past acts of the Government for the present appear to be lost sight of. I deem it therefore in the best interest of our party that Hon. Mr. McLean should be allowed to be returned without opposition.'

Six hundred teams and 1,500 men are working on Regina & Long Lake Railway. Sixty miles of line have been graded, and it is now thought that the road will be completed to Saskatoon this fall.

Doctors to Order.

A Portsmouth, N.H., despatch says: A great sensation has been caused here by the discovery of another bogus college of medicine similar in management and larger than the Druid College of Maine, a full expose of which was made some years ago. The latest chartered institution is the Trinity University of Medicine and Surgery, having nominal headquarters at Bennington, Vt. Its methods of business are these: Any person desiring to buy a diploma covering both medicine and surgery has, if possessing the necessary money, been given his choice of the following institutions, all of which exist merely on paper: University of Cincinnati, Montreal Medical College, Trenton, N. J., Medical College, New York State Medical College, University of New Hampshire, Trinity University of Medicine and Surgery. The value of sheepskins representing the above institutions has varied from $60 to $300 each. There is no doubt that hundreds of them have been purchased throughout the West and South, while New England has been victimized by scores.

Signor Salvini has left Havre for the States. His route for the short season of twenty weeks will include New York, Boston, Providence, Pittsburg, Buffalo, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Cleveland, Columbus, Detroit, Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Omaha, Kansas City Denver and probably St. Louis. Salvini will play four nights each week, making his season consist of about eighty performances.

Voices of the Fair.

"Come on, now, good people! This way to the Fair!"
"They're fresh and they're juicy, they're ripe and they're rare!"
"Oh, what are those things with the big whirring wheels?"
"Now don't go in there, girls; let's go see the seals."
"Oh, isn't that sweet!" "Here's your pink lemonade!"
"Take back that bananer; the darn thing's decayed!"
"Oh, just see her face and the light on his hair;
It's wonderfully painted." "Jane, git me a chair;
Land sakes, I'm most dead!" "Here you are now, this way;
A half dime! a nickel! just five cents to-day!"
"She's the only lady with two distinct heads!
Don't miss it!" "Oh, ma, what's that under them sheds!"
"Here's all you can eat now for thirty-five cents!"
"I see the balloon over there by the fence!"
"I tell you there's no pork in these; not a bit!"
"Don't eat them, good people; you'll all have a fit!"
"Why yours are all cinders; they're half raw, while mine ——"
"Come here for your pictures; I'll make you look fine!"
Oh, my, ain't it crowded; I wisht I was home!"
"Please give me a big cup of clear tea with foam."
"Oh, look! Oh, my gracious, suppose he should fall!"
"Just see him go up! Oh, my, isn't he small?"
"Just look, now; he's jumped!" "Here's hot coffee and tea!"
"I really suppose he's as scared as can be."
"That car's just chuck ful; I must stand up; oh, dear,
I vow I won't kill myself comin' next year."

Kissing on the Platform.

"Bohemian" writes in the St. Thomas Journal: The railway stations are the great kissing marts of the world. It is there you can see kissing in all its styles, and it is interesting to watch the people doing the kissing act. All the different varieties of kissing known to civilized and uncivilized men can be seen, and to witness the exhibition takes all the sentiment out of a kiss for the spectator. People in every walk of life go to the railway station to meet friends and relatives, and the styles of kissing to be found there are about as plentiful as the leaves that strew the brooks of Vallombrosa. Some come together with a quick movement, a short, sharp report and break away again, the osculatory exercise being over before it had hardly begun. This is the ordinary kiss of greeting between friends and relatives. The kiss that occupies about the medium duration of time is that between husband and wife. The husband for some weeks past has put in just a "miserable" time whilst his wife has been rusticating with friends. The poor fellow has been out with the boys every night, playing whist, billiards, taking in everything in the shape of fun, and taken altogether has been having a very ruddy time. To tell the truth he is not sorry to see his "pardner" back, but he cannot forget what a "miserable" time he has been having, and he has to make out he is more pleased that she is back than he really is, and he makes a desperate attempt to kiss her as he used to in the old days before and just after marriage. But he has not the staying power and the kiss is only a counterfeit—there is not the cling to it there was when the couple were only lovers. The true lover's kiss is a thing of beauty and a joy forever. As soon as they get their eyes upon each other, these two souls with but a single thought fall upon each other's necks, wind their arms around each other with a lock hitch at the back, their lips come together with a loud report, which gradually dies away like a distant echo, the lips are slowly drawn apart, the arms unwound and the clinging kiss is over. There is no persons in the wide world so oblivious to what is passing around them as a couple engaged in a clinging kissing bee, and they will stand right there and cling no matter if 300 persons are taking it in. A case of this kind was witnessed at the station the other day. A young dude waited around for several trains, and when no familiar face showed up in the crowd he would retire looking disconsolate. At last the party he was looking for appeared. She was a young girl of the dudine order. He could barely restrain himself until she came within reach. As soon as he dared he made a dash and grabbed the object of his affection. "Oh, me dawlin!" he exclaimed, and their lips met in a clinging kiss. The brim of her big hat came down over the dude's little head and completely hid it from view. Those behind them stopped to enjoy the sight, and a small boy fired a volley into them like this: "Break away there!" "Come off the roost!" "Ain't we all in it?" But they paid no attention to the gags, and did not break away till they were good and ready.

Testing Soils by the Color of Plants.

M. Georges Ville, a French scientific agriculturist, after almost thirty years of assiduous researches on the experimental farm at Vincennes, has made a remarkable and important discovery of a relation existing between the color of plants and the richness of soils in fertilizing agents. His conclusions, recently reported to the Paris Academy of Sciences, deserve consideration by all farmers and horticulturists. He finds that the color of the leaves of plants undergoes marked change whenever the soil is lacking in phosphate potash, lime or nitrogen. The color remains light green or turns to yellow when the soil is deficient in phosphate potash or nitrogen. When none of the fertilizing elements are wanting the color is a dark green. By his experiments M. Ville furnishes agriculturists with positive indications by which they can determine with the greatest facility what kind of fertilizer the soil needs most or in what elements of fertility it abounds. His experiments should be repeated by our Department of Agriculture and the results published. The practical information which might thus be supplied to American farmers would enable many of them to "make two blades of grass grow where one now grows.'

Within the Law.

Wild-eyed Man—I want a lot of poison right off.

Drug Clerk—It's against the law to sell poisons to people who look as if they wanted to commit suicide; but I'll let you have a bottle of Dr. Black-Sequin's Elixir of Life. That seems to be pretty sure death.

It is announced that the Queen has postponed until next year her contemplated visit to Strathpeffer Spa, Rossshire, but will prolong her stay at Balmoral until November. She will probably go to Aix-les-Bains early in the spring.

CURRENT TOPICS.

On Saturday the city of London elected a Lord Mayor and two Sheriffs. As an evidence that the day of disabilities is over, it is only necessary to state that the new Lord Mayor is a Hebrew and a Jew, one Sheriff a Catholic and the other an Atheist.

It is said that a vast army of tramps is abroad along the entire length of the Pennsylvania Railway, and like a swarm of locusts is devouring everything edible in its track. Decent, peaceable people are alarmed at the invasion. Farmers are at the mercy of these tramps, railway cars are pillaged and train hands assaulted. The queer thing about the matter is that these tramps came from the mines, factories and foundries of Pennsylvania, the most highly protected State in the Union, and the men are the offspring of the over protected trades.

The motto of the British Volunteers is "Defence, not defiance." They are wholly for home protection and cannot be sent abroad. The War Office has just elaborated a scheme of defence and now every volunteer knows exactly where he is to be placed in a time of invasion, what is required of him and how he is to get to his destination. It is noticeable that in the arrangement Scotland has more volunteers than will be required in her defence. Having made herself all serene she will send to the assistance of England the two Highland and South of Scotland Brigades, with the guns of the Fife, Ayr, Galloway, Aberdeen and Inverness Artillery Corps, besides movable batteries of garrison gunners from the seven brigades, and garrison gunners of the second class from the Banff, Argyll, Caithness and Orkney brigades. Four days after the order for mobilization every volunteer will be at his destination.

Ontario does not lack lawyers. Sometimes we are inclined to think there are too many of them, but we cannot sympathize with the measures that are spoken of to reduce the supply. One plan is to compel the students to attend the Law School both morning and afternoon, thus discriminating against those who depend for support upon the salaries they earn in the offices. Another plan is to raise the fees for becoming solicitor and barrister from $90 and $100 to $400 and $500. These changes would simply leave the door open to rich men's sons, and close it against the poor. A far better scheme would be to raise the standard of qualification — to make the examinations harder. A head test is better than a pocket test. By the way, is it just the thing to let a company of lawyers decide the terms upon which other men shall be allowed to practice law, or to let the doctors' guild fix the barriers surrounding the medical profession? The merchants have no such close corporation, nor have the editors, nor the carpenters, nor many other classes of workers, who, to put it mildly, require more brains than the lawyers to make a living. If the lawyers over-do the fencing-out business, the public will be apt to help the law students to re-arrange the whole system.

Wilkie Collins, the novelist and dramatist, died Monday. Some weeks ago it was cabled here that Mr. Collins was dying, but he afterwards rallied and for a time seemed to improve. Death, however, has overtaken him at last, and with his life disappears one of the familiar literary figures of the 19th century. William Wilkie Collins was the eldest son of William Collins, the well-known painter of rustic scenes, and was born in London in January, 1824. After being educated at a private school and spending two years with his parents in Italy he was articled for four years to a firm in the tea trade, but he soon quit to study law. His first literary production was a biography of his father, published in 1848. From this time he devoted himself entirely to literature, and published successively "Antonina," 1851; "Basil," 1852; "Mr. Ray's Cash Book," 1852; "Hide and Seek," 1854, etc. Soon afterwards he became a contributor to the Household Word, and his "After Dark" and "The Dead Secret" are reprints of the tales which originally appeared in that periodical. In 1859 he published the "Queen of Hearts" and in 1860 his masterpiece, "The Woman in White." In 1862 "No Name" appeared, followed in 1863 by "My Miscellanies" and in 1866 by "Armadale." "The Moonstone," "Man to Wife" and many other works followed in rapid succession. Of late years he has contributed largely to Harper's Magazine. Mr. Collins' works have been translated into almost every modern language and have run through several editions. He was a member of the Guild of Literature and Art. "He wrote "The Light House," first played in private at Tavistock House and afterward produced at the Olympic Theatre. "The Frozen Deep" was produced at Tavistock House by a company of amateurs, among whom was Charles Dickens. Mr. Collins dramatized "The Moonstone" in 1877.

Many Years a Bachelor.

Young lady (to middle-aged gentleman at Saratoga)—Mr. Rivington, I suppose you are very fond of little children?

Mr. R.—Yes, indeed; passionately fond of them.

Young lady—You have some of your own, have you not?

Mr. R.—Oh, no; I'm a bachelor.

Young lady (innocently)—You don't mean it? How long have you been a bachelor?

Indisputable Evidence.

De Pole—Where do you intend to spend your vacation?

De Pole—I am going to our milkman's dairy farm. There is the finest kind of fishing in that neighborhood.

"Hub! You don't take his word for it, do you?"

"No, indeed. We've found young trout in his milk."

"Tiny" Quantrell, the English jockey, is now riding for a stable in Pennsylvania. He is a little fellow, not more than four feet in height. He has had a wide experience in his calling. He has had mounts in hundreds of races in England, including a number of Derbys. He has ridden in the Grand Prix at Paris, has plied the whip and spurs in South Africa, and has raced on every track in Australia. He has been in the west for sometime, and is making his way back to England, having got as far as the Keystone State.

ARISTOCRATIC SPORT.

What it Costs to Maintain a Deer Forest in Scotland.

No one but a millionaire will think of hiring a deer forest. And yet there are deer forests with fishing which are not highly rented for men of modest means and a quiet mode of life. The lodge party, the champagne luncheons, the racket and fashion of the west end transported to Glen Sneeshin—these are what render deer-stalking expensive. Still it is computed that each deer that is shot costs its slayer fifty guineas. There are over a hundred deer forests in Scotland, some (like the forest of Mar, Blackmount, or Glenstrathfarrar) of immense extent, the first of those named comprising 80,100 acres. They occupy about 2,000,000 acres on the whole. Estimating their rental at 2s 6d per acre, this alone amounts to £150,000. The cost of living and various other modes of outlay will certainly add £50,000 to these figures. Ample is the harvest of gold which the Pactolus of deer-stalking rolls though some of the most barren districts of the Highlands, running, however, by an easy transition to a grouse moore, here rents are much easier, yet each brace of grouse shot is supposed to cost the sportsman £1. Moors stand at from 10d to 2s 7d, or 2s 6d per acre, with lodges upon them. Taking a case, for instance, where the rental would be 2s per acre, a shooting of 1,000 acres would cost the lessee £100, and the acres of heather ought to hold a hundred brace of grouse, while fifty brace would be left as breeding stock. There are not less than 2,400 shootings in Scotland (in addition to the deer forests) which hold grouse as well as other sport. In a good season it is estimated that 500,000 brace of grouse will be shot in Scotland, which represents the same number of pounds in rent. Travelling and living must, of course, be included in the costliness of these moors. Taking on an average ten sportsman annually as visiting each of these forests and moors, 25,000 persons, besides ladies, children and servants, have to be transported to and fro, and if £20 each be allowed for this purpose, the modest sum of £500,000 must be added to the amount of rental.

Demoralizing Drinks.

"Give me a great double-barreled, centre-fire, back action drink of soda and phosphate," ordered a jolly customer at a drug store last night. "Do you know what this favorite of yours is doing for you?" asked the venerable druggist, as the customer drained his glass. "Killing the nausea in my stomach'," was the reply. "Yes, and it's killing your stomach, too. Some of these days you'll want it copper-plated, and you'll want in vain. Phosphate is something that no one should take except after a full meal. Why? Well, I will explain. You wouldn't think that the inflammable ends of matches were a proper thing to eat, would you? But phosphate is derived from phosphorus, and if you used it to excess it will burn out your stomach just as alcohol would if used in excess. You feel benefited by it now, but if you keep on the time will come when you will wish that you had never heard of phosphate. Of course, we sell it because there is a foolish craze for it, but I advise no one to use much of the fiery substance." "Should no one use it at all?" "In moderate quantities just after a full meal it will not hurt any one; but beware of using it in excess or on an empty stomach, for if you do that organ will need half-soling and heeling some time."

Life is Much What We Make it.

Take time; it is no use to fume or fret, or do as the angry housekeeper who has got hold of the wrong key, pushes, shakes and rattles it about the lock until both are broken and the door is still unopened.

The chief secret in comfort lies in not suffering trifles to vex us and in cultivating our undergrowth of small pleasures.

Try to regard present vexations as you will regard them a month hence.

Since we cannot get what we like let us like what we can get.

It is not riches, it is not poverty, it is human nature that is the trouble.

The world is like a looking-glass. Laugh at it and it laughs back; frown at it and it frowns back.

Angry thoughts canker the mind and dispose it to the worst temper in the world—that of fixed malice and revenge. It is while in this temper that most men become criminals.

Show your sense by saying much in a few words.

Try to speak some kind word or do some kind deed each day of your life. You will be amply repaid.

A TIMELY WAIL.

The season grows colder apace,
The winds begin to roar;
So, when you come into this place,
Please, mister, shut the door.

It's most too warm for fires as yet,
They'd open every pore;
But frost has come, mankind to fret,
So, mister, shut the door.

Don't leave it swinging while we sneeze,
And christen you a bore;
Unless you want to see us freeze,
Why, hang it, shut the door!

Don't make us shiver 'till we're blue,
And hanker for your gore;
Look here, we've said all we're going to on this subject, and the next thing you know we'll be over there wiping the floor up with you Unless you shut that door.

—Hotel guest (sitting up in bed, watch in hand)—Six o'clock and nobody comes to wake me. I shall be sure to miss the train.

LIPS THAT NEVER TOUCH.

Japanese Are Ignorant of the Pleasures of Osculation.

Over in the Mikado's empire kissing is an unknown pleasure, and even between husband and wife osculatory enjoyment is a liberty never indulged in. Although the young Japanese maidens have the rosiest of lips, the whitest of teeth and the sweetest of smiles, their dainty little mouths are as forbidden fruit to their sighing swains, who must content themselves with more formal manifestations of their love. A Tokio correspondent of the San Francisco Chronicle writes thus:

'Tis a melancholy fact, but a Japanese has no such impulse. No lover courts his mistress with "sweetest persuasive kisses." No mother kisses her baby as she hugs it to her bosom. Parting husband presses the hand of his wife and bends her forehead to the mats in sad farewell. Our salutations run through the crescendo of bow, handshake, kiss and kiss. I can't explain the difference in grade between the last two, but everybody knows. But in Japan the expression of regard is regulated by the number and length of the salaams. A friend who constantly travels about the country told me of a little illustration in point. He had been on the road for six weeks, having with him a native merchant who was interested in his business. On their return to Tokio he accompanied the broker to his home, a permit for the night's visit having been obtained from the local Inspector of Police. The wife met her husband and friend at the door and ushered them in. Together they assisted their guest to remove his coat. The wife next took from her lord his wadded kimono and other wraps and folded them away. Then, and not until then, did they kneel upon the mats and bow long and low to each other. "You have been many weeks away from us," said the wife, in a sweet, affectionate voice. "We have waited for you with impatience. I hope that you are well, dear lanoskesan." And he thanked her and said he was.

Virtue in Good Coffee.

So extensive is the adulteration of coffee it is not easy to obtain the pure article, even although the highest prices be paid. The substance commonly used in adulteration are chicory, roasted grains, peas or beans. The principal element of roasted chicory is sugar. It is useful in coloring the decoction, but adds nothing to its virtues. As for the other substances, although they may be harmless, considering their use from an economic point of view, nothing is made in buying coffee which contains them, even if the price of the mixture be much under that demanded for the pure article. This is evident when it is known that not infrequently what passes for low price coffee contains at least 60 per cent. adulteration. In buying coffee the pure is actually the cheapest. And in the matter of adulteration of this important article of food there is a weighty consideration beyond that of economy. The more good, pure coffee there is obtainable the less will be the demand for spirituous liquors, for even the veriest toper will often choose the former in preference to the latter.—Boston Herald.

The Bashfulness of Office.

A tourist stopped in front of a "shack" house, over the door of which a prominent Kansan was nailing a sign, bearing this legend: "I am a candydate for the offis of sherf."

"That is very unlike the way we do in the East," remarked the tourist. "There we believe, with the proverb, that the office should seek the man, and ——"

"Wal," interrupted the prominent one, "that may do fer the East, whur the offices hain't so durned bashful; but, out this way, if you expect the office to ride up to your place, an', whirlin the loose uv its lasso three times round its head, drag you outer your house an' off to the county seat, I'm afeard that grim disappointment will be your portion."—Puck.

Value of Christian Heads.

In the late war between the black flags of Tonquin and the French, the leader of the Chinese outlaws made a monetary estimate of the value of his enemies. He offered his men a sum equivalent to $125 for the head of every Frenchmen and $25 additional if the victim had gold braid on his coat. The fact that most orientials express great contempt for native Christians was illustrated in this black flag proclamation, which offered $50 apiece for the heads of native soldiers in the French service, but added that $15 for the heads of native Catholics was all they were worth.

IRELAND AT PARIS.

Magnificent Specimens of Art in Textiles.

One of the most delicate exhibitors of long-skilled handicraft, at the present French exhibition, is from the linen looms of Ireland, in the form of damask napkins out of a set of two dozen doilies, made for a jubilee gift to Queen Victoria by a Belfast manufacturer. These doilies are woven from the finest linen yarn which has ever yet been spun from flax fibre. The napkin is exhibited in its unbleached state, and also in its bleached and finished condition. Upon each is a strikingly faithful delineation of the factory from which it comes. The building is photographed, as it were, in the linen web. One of these damask doilies, about sixteen inches square, contains 3,060 threads of warp and 4,012 threads of woof, and these threads, joined together, would extend a distance of more than two miles. Yet the napkin seems to be the merest figment of gossamer—a fabric of lightest gauze, a thing one might blow away with a breath.

The draughtsman was engaged for seven months in the preparation of the enlarged design—about twelve feet square—upon paper. This plan or map, so to speak, of the napkin was divided by fine machine rulings into 12,000,000 squares, each line standing for one thread of the web. On the damask work are represented 44 different species of ferns, birds, butterflies and flowers. Irish lace, hand-made, at 100 guineas a yard, handkerchiefs at $250 each, and many other samples of exquisite skill and patient toil, from the north of Ireland looms, are included in the display. In further illustration of this great industry, there is a display of flaxseed, the flax plant with its blue flower, flax straw, scutched flax and flax spun into yarn and wound upon bobbins ready for weaving. There are also illustrated plans of the different processes of making damasks, and the entire exhibit is appropriately surmounted by one of the most ancient specimens of an Irish flax wheel for spinning nen thread.

The Burdens of Womanhood.

Thousands of women are silently suffering untold misery, simply because they shrink from consulting a physician in those numerous complaints arising from functional irregularities and disorders. Many a modest girl and woman prefers to bear her heavy burden in silence rather than to go to the family physician for advice. All sufferers from this class of disorders can, however, find prompt and sure relief in Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It is a specific in such cases, and has brightened the lives of countless women by restoring them to perfect health.

Poison the fountain and the stream is impure; poison the blood, and its taint is carried through the entire system—those innumerable veins and arteries carry disease and death instead of life and vitality. As a result, you have Headache, Scrofula, Dyspepsia, Kidney Disease, Liver Complaint and General Debility. An inactive Liver means poisoned blood; Constipation means poisoned blood; Kidney disorder means poisoned blood. The great antidote for impure blood is Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. Acting directly upon the affected organs, restores them to their normal condition. "A word to the wise is sufficient." The "Discovery" is guaranteed to cure in all cases of disease for which it is recommended, or money paid for it will be promptly refunded.

Osprey Fall Show.

Osprey fall exhibition was held at Maxwell on Friday last. Extremely unfavorable weather in the morning prevented many from attending, but this did not appear to prevent the fair becoming a success. In the afternoon a large number were present. It was late when all the entries had been given in, the energetic secretary, Mr. D. Grant, of Singhampton, being kept industriously at work until nearly 2 o'clock seeing to these matters, consequently judging of live stock was made rather late, and it was nearly five o'clock when the Orange Hall was opened to the general public. Inside the exhibit was very fair, a splendid exhibit of roots, especially, being made. There was also a good exhibit of grain. In ladies' work the show was rather scanty. In fruit Mr. James Stewart, of Kimberley, was, we believe, the only exhibitor, and took something like fourteen prizes in that class, besides prizes for grain. Nice samples of honey were shown, Mr. Wm. Guy taking first for strained. The outside exhibit of stock was not extra large, but the quality, especially in horse flesh, was A 1. Two magnificent cows and two calves were shown by a gentleman living in Nottawasaga, whose name we did not learn. The exhibit of sheep was small and the quality not good. The same may be said of pigs. Taken as a whole, however, the show was a pronounced success, and the directorate may congratulate themselves upon the interest manifest by the people of Osprey, notwithstanding the very miserable weather experienced. Look out for prize list next week. We have to thank the directors for many courtesies shown, and Mr. R. Y. Burk for a present of the prize winter radishes.

The Advance cannot live, of course, without the "confidence" of the Standard, and therefore we hasten forward with this apology.

Progress of Inventors Since 1845

In the year 1845 the present owners of the Scientific American newspaper commenced its publication, and soon after established a bureau for the procuring of patents for inventors at home and in foreign countries. During the year 1845 there were only 502 patents issued from the U.S. Patent Office, and the total issue from the establishment of the Patent Office, up to the end of that year, numbered only 4,347.

Up to the first of July this year there have been granted 407,413. Showing that since the commencement of the publication of the Scientific American there have been issued from the U. S. Patent Office 402,166 patents, and about one third more applications have been made than have been granted, showing the ingenuity of our people to be phenomenal, and much greater than even the enormous number of patents issued indicates. Probably a good number of our readers have had business transacted thorugh the office of the Scientific American, in New York or Washington, and are familiar with Munn & Co's mode of doing business, but those who have not will be interested in knowing something about this, the oldest patent soliciting firm in this country, probably in the world.

Persons visiting the office of the Scientific American, 361 Broadway, N.Y., for the first time, will be surprised, on entering the main office, to find such an extensive and elegantly, equipped establishment, with its walnut counters, desks, and chairs to correspond, and its enormous safes, and such a large number of draughtsmen, specification writers, and clerks, all busy as bees, reminding one of a large banking office, with its hundred employees.

In conversation with one of the firm, who had commenced the business of soliciting patents in connection with the publication of the Scientific American, more than forty years ago, I learned his firm had made application for patents for upward of one hundred thousand inventors in the United States, and several thousands in different foreign countries, and had filed as many cases in the Patent Office in a single month as there were patents issued during the entire first year of their business career. This gentleman had seen the Patent Office grow from a sapling to a sturdy oak, and he modestly hinted that many thought the Scientific American, with its large circulation, has preformed no mean share in stimulating inventors and advancing the interests of the Patent Office. But it is not alone the patent soliciting that occupies the attention of the one hundred persons employed by Munn & Co., but a large number are engaged on the four publications issued weekly and monthly from their office 361 Broadway, N.Y., viz.: The Scientifit American, the Scientific American Supplement, the Expert Edition of the Scientific American, and the Architects and Builders Edition of the Scientific American. The first two publications are issued every week, and the latter two, the first of every month.

THE GREAT WEEKLY PAPER

OF THE DOMINION,

and special arrangements are being made to add new and attractive features, which will greatly increase its interest and value.

As an inducement to place it in the hands of all PATRIOTIC CANADIANS the balance of present year will be given

FREE TO NEW SUBSCRIBERS,

Making it only $1.70 for the Empire and Flesherton Advance, from now to the end of 1890.

A GIFT!

SOMETHING FOR EVERYBODY

In order to secure another thousand subscribers before January next we have decided to make a great sacrificial offer for the balance of this year.

We have made arrangements with a publisher whereby we are enabled to make a magnificent gift to all our subscribers. We offer you your own choice from a list of splendid books, printed in clear type on good paper, or a monthly farmer's magazine for one year, upon the following terms: Every new subscriber remitting one dollar to us between the date of this circular and Jan. 1 next will receive The Advance for 1890 and balance of this year free, and may also select one from our list of books. And in order that all may fare alike we offer to our old subscribers, who will send in any arrearages and the dollar in advance for next year, before, or on Jan. 1, 1890, a choice from the appended list of books.

N. B.—The books will not be delivered until after Jan. 1, next, in order that all may be sent out at one time. Where they are to be sent by mail five cents extra must be sent with the order, to pay postage.

This is a bona fide gift, made as an experiment, and the most liberal ever made by a local newspaper. The names will be enrolled as received and the books delivered in that order. Here is the list:

1 THE AMERICAN FARMER, monthly, for one year.
2 A House of Tears, by E. Downey.
3 Sara Crewe and Edith's Burglar, by Frances Hodgson Burnett.
4 The Abbey Murder, by Joseph Hatton.
5 The Argonauts of North Liberty, by Bret Harte.
6 The Fortunes of Philippa Fairfax, by Mrs. F. H. Burnett.
7 Dr. Glennie's Daughter, by B. L. Farjeon.
8 A Mere Child, by L. B. Walford.
9 The Queen's Token, by Mrs. Cashel Hoey.
10 A Missing Husband, by George R. Sims.
11 The Earl's Wife, same author.
12 An Algonquin Maiden, by G. Mercer Adam and E. Wetherald.
13 Heaven and Hell, by E. Swedenborg.
14 Stranger than Fiction, by Kenneth Lee.
15 The Story of an African Farm, by Ralph Iron.
16 John Ward, Preacher, by Margaret Deland.
17 Buffalo Bill, by Ned Buntline.
18 Michael Strogoff, by Jules Verne.
19 The Gunmaker of Moscow, by S. Cobb, a capital story.
20 Maria Monk.
21 Robert Elsmere, by Mrs. Humphrey Ward.
22 Rudder Grange, by Frank R. Stockton.
23 Ten Nights in a Barroom, by T. S. Arthur.
24 A Dangerous Catspaw, a detective story.
25 Helo n's Babies, by Habberton.
26 Ben Hur, by General Lew Wallace.
27 Seaside Cook Book.
28 Day's Ready Reckoner, complete.
29 Chesterfield's Letter Writer and Etiquette, Complete.

Remember these two facts: You secure what is admittedly the best local paper in Grey, and get a present of another dollar paper or a book to while away the winter evenings. Our offer only holds good up to and including Jan. 1, 1890. Such another offer will, in all likelihood, never be made again. Do not put off sending in your orders until the last moment.

The decorating committee of the Harvest Home festival should have got to work on Saturday last and fixed up the church. There was not a decoration of any kind to show that the services were anything more than ordinary. A few hours' work would have made the church appear to harmonize with the sermons, and the services more impressive.

San Francisco the Beautiful.

The Advance strongly advises its readers to be on the alert for letters which will shortly appear in these columns descriptive of the city of San Francisco and California. It is written by the talented authoress of "Across the Continent," and will prove extremely interesting. Her former letters attracted much attention, and this series of articles descriptive of San Francisco and the Golden State will prove equally fascinating. This week is a good time to subscribe and secure The Advance one year and nearly four months and a valuable book, all for the sum of one dollar. No such wonderful offer was ever made before. "Strike while the iron is hot" and get three times the value for your money. Read our fall campaign announcement elsewhere.

A good young horse, four years old, a "Byron," without fault or blemish, time for payment will be given. JOHN W. ARMSTRONG, Flesherton.

Plowing Match.

The annual fall plowing match of the united townships of Artemesia, Glenelg, Proton and Egremont, will be held near Priceville on Friday, Oct. 18th. The farm has not been selected up to time of going to press.

Could Not be Served.

A business man of Flesherton recently rendered a statement of account to a minister who was one time a resident of Maxwell. The letter was returned. It had been opened by some person, and on the back of the account was written: "Mr. Blank is in heaven and his wife is in Port Perry."

Damage.

A large amount of damage has been done in this vicinity to fruit and ornamental trees by the snow storm of Saturday night. None of the leaves had fallen, and therefore the snow made huge pyramids of white out of the trees, weighing down limbs and breaking them off in large numbers.

A Treat.

Those who attended the Methodist church on Sunday evening last had the unexpected pleasure of listening to that Canadian queen of song, Mrs. Clara E. Shilton, of Toronto. She sang two solos in a manner that should disarm all critics. Her singing was greatly enjoyed by the congregation, as it is by all who hear her.

Barn Burned.

On Friday last the frame barn belonging to Mr. Jas. Henry, North Line, near Priceville was destroyed, together with grain, hay and a large number of fowl, including forty turkeys. The circumstances were somewhat peculiar. Mr. Henry was threshing on that day, the machine engaged belonging to Mr. Charles Ryan. All the grain had been threshed and the hands were cleaning up the floor, when fire was discovered near the machine. It spread almost incredibly fast, and there was only time to run out the thresher and the farm implements, which were in another part of the barn. One rumor said that the spark arrester had been removed for the purpose of cleaning it, and the fire started from a spark from the engine, but whether this is a fact we have been unable to learn. Mr. Henry's loss will mount up to nearly seven hundred dollars, and will be a heavy blow to him. There was no insurance.

Ladies should see the checked gray flannel at the Flesherton factory.

Terrible Gunning Accident.

Thomas Lyons, son of Mr. John Lyons, of Tyrone, aged 22, met with a terrible accident on Friday last while out shooting in company with a companion named Shearson, in the vicinity of Proton Station. It appears that the young men were on the lookout for a deer, and young Shearson had placed a ball in his gun upon the load of fine shot. While going through a brush heap Shearson held his gun over his shoulder with the muzzle pointing forward, and a twig raised the hammer, discharging the gun, the whole contents of which entered Lyons' arm and back. The arm was terribly shattered, and the wounded man had to walk four miles to his brother's place near Proton Station. Drs. Greenlau and McWilliams, of Dundalk, and Dr. Sproule of Markdale, were summoned, and found it necessary to amputate the arm at the shoulder. This was done twenty-four hours after the accident occurred, and the young man is now progressing favorably, but complains more of the injury to his back from the effects of the fine shot than that of the amputated arm.

Passed Away.

We have this week to record the death of one of the oldest and most respected citizens of this vicinity, Mr. Madill, father of Mr. Alexander Madill. Mr. Madill was born in Ireland in the year 1804, and had consequently reached the advanced age of eighty-four years. He emigrated to this country when quite young and settled for a while on the Toronto line, near Flesherton, and underwent, with his now aged and still surviving helpmeet, all the hardships of a pioneer life. Like most of his countrymen he possessed a very strong constitution, and until about ten years ago, when he had a severe attack of bronchitis, scarcely knew what it was to be sick. Since that time until about three weeks before his death he enjoyed tolerably good health, but for two weeks previous to his death he was confined to his bed, and bore his sickness with christian fortitude. On Wednesday night he calmly and peacefully passed into the land where the inhabitants never grow old or never say "I am sick." For a number of years and up till the time of his death he lived with his son, Mr. Alex. Madill, about two miles north of Eugenia, whence his remains were borne to the cemetery, Flesherton, on Friday afternoon, there to wait "The Great Day when we shall all be contemporaries and make our appearance together." To the lonely widow and the bereaved family we would offer our sincere sympathy, and comfort them with the thought that though he will never come back to them, they may go to him.

Harvest Home.

The harvest home festival which was held in the Methodist church on Tuesday evening last was a decided success in point of program, but not so much so in that of the number present. Tea was given in the basement, which had been most beautifully and tastily decorated by several young ladies, viz., Miss Armstrong, Miss Wright, Miss Lou Armstrong, Miss Ada Sproule and Miss A. Thurston. The taste exhibited in arranging the grain, vegetables, flowers and autumn leaves was truly creditable to the artistic abilities of these young ladies. A most bountiful repast was served, in fact the cuisine was equal or superior to anything we have ever seen in that line. After the inner man had been catered to, the audience adjourned to the body of the church where a program of unusual excellence was presented. Mr. Thos. Gamey, the popular reeve of Osprey, occupied the chair, and the managing committee did a wise thing when they placed Mr. Gamey there. The program consisted of music and speeches of a superior order throughout. The choir rendered a couple of pieces in most excellent style. Rev Mr. Watson was the first speaker, and delivered a short, pithy address which was listened to with much interest. Other speakers were Mr. Thorpe Wright, who has the happy and rare faculty of amusing while he instructs; Mr. Thos. Graiger, who was unprepared to deliver a lengthy address; Mr. John Shilton, of Toronto, who can talk, as all lawyers can, and yet say something instructive, at the same time evolving ideas which will make one think; Rev. Mr. Baggin, chairman of the district, who—well, everybody knows what Mr Baggin can do. The great pleasure of the evening, however, was the somewhat unexpected presence of Mrs. Clara E. Shilton, of Toronto. This lady rendered the following solos during the evening: "Lullaby Song;" as an encore, "Come in and Shut the Gate." "Jerusalem," by Parker, and as an encore, "No Place like Home." Mrs. Shilton's singing powers are, in our estimation, beyond any criticism whatever, and her music was all the more enjoyed from the fact that in all probability it is the last opportunity which Flesherton people will have of hearing this talented lady at home. Those who missed hearing her this time lost a rare treat. Mr. Evans rendered a bass solo, "The Old Sexton," and gave as an encore "The Model church," both of which were well received. A pretty quartet by Messrs. Evans and Beecroft and Misses Richardson and Beecroft, completed the program. The whole affair was very pleasant and enjoyable, the only thing to mar it's success being the comparatively slim attendance of farmers. The proceeds amounted to something over forty-five dollars.

Maxwell

From our own Correspondent.

The four days' special services that were held last week in the Methodist church were not very well attended owing to wet weather. Mr Brown opened the services by preaching from Exodus, 14th chap. 13th v. Mr. Weatherall, of Singhampton, occupied the pulpit in the evening. Mr. Shilton, of Flesherton, preached afternoon and evening of Tuesday. On Wednesday afternoon Mr. Flint, of Ravenna, was present, and in the evening Mr McNeil, the Presbyterian minister. Mr. Flint stayed and helped in the services on Thursday morning and afternoon. Mr. Brown occupied the pulpit on Thursday night. Service was also held on Friday night, and they will be continued every evening this week.

Osprey fair was a success. There was a larger number present this year than there has been for some time.

The Rev. Mr. Hall, of the Church of England, preached his farewell sermon on Sunday morning. The congregation was very small, on accoount of the cold and disagreeable morning. Every one is sorry that Mr. Hall's three months' vacation is at an end. A minister has not yet been secured in his place.

CHAPTER VIII.

SHARES LOOKING UP.

There were others who echoed her ladyship's words afterward, though they echoed them privately and with more caution than my lady felt necessary. It is certain that Miss Octavia Bassett did not improve, as time progressed, and she had enlarged opportunities for studying the noble example set before her by Slowbridge.

On his arrival in New York, Martin Bassett telegraphed to his daughter and sister, per Atlantic cable, informing them that he might be detained a couple of months, and bidding them to be of good cheer. The arrival of the message, in its official envelope, so alarmed Miss Belinda that she was supported by Mary Anne while it was read to her by Octavia, who received it without any surprise whatever. For some time after its completion, Slowbridge had privately disbelieved in the Atlantic cable, and, until this occasion, had certainly disbelieved in the existence of people who received messages through it. In fact, on first finding that she was the recipient of such a message, Miss Belinda had made immediate preparations for fainting quietly away, being fully convinced that a shipwreck had occurred, which had resulted in brother's death and that his executors had chosen this delicate method of breaking the news.

"A message by Atlantic cable?" she had gasped. "Don't—don't read it, my love. L—let some one else do that. Poor—poor child! Trust in Providence, my love, and—and bear up. Ah, how I wish I had a stronger mind, and could be of more service to you."

"It is a message from father," said Octavia. "Nothing is the matter. He's all right. He got in on Saturday."

"Ah!" panted Miss Belinda. "Are you quite sure, my dear—are you quite sure?"

"That's what he says. Listen."

"Got in Saturday. Piper met me. Shares looking up. May be kept here two months. Will write. Keep up your spirits.

"MARTIN BASSETT.

"Thank heaven!" sighed Miss Belinda. "Thank heaven!"

"Why?" said Octavia.

"Why?" echoed Miss Belinda. "Ah, my dear, if you knew how terrified I was; I felt sure that something had happened. A cable message, my dear! I never received a telegram in my life before, and to receive a cable message was really a shock."

"Well, I don't see why," said Octavia. "It seems to me it is pretty much like any other message."

Miss Belinda regarded her timidly.

"Does your papa often send them?" she inquired. "Surely it must be expensive."

"I don't suppose it's cheap," Octavia replied, "but it saves time and worry. I should have had to wait twelve days for a letter."

"Very true," said Miss Belinda, "but—"

She broke off with rather a distressed shake of the head. Her simple ideas of economy and quiet living were frequently upset in these times. She had begun to regard her niece with a slight feeling of awe, and yet Octavia had not been doing anything at all remarkable in her own eyes, and considered her life pretty dull.

If the elder Miss Bassett, her parents and grandparents, had not been so thoroughly well known and so universally respected; if their social position had not been so firmly established, and their quiet lives not quite so highly respectable, there is an awful possibility that Slowbridge might even have gone so far as not to ask Octavia out to tea at all. But even Lady Theobald felt that it would not do to slight Belinda Bassett's niece and guest. To omit the customary state teas would have been to crush innocent Miss Belinda at a blow, and place her—through the medium of this young lady who, alone, deserved condemnation—beyond the pale of all social law.

"It is only to be regretted," said her ladyship, "that Belinda Bassett has not arranged things better. Relatives of such an order are certainly to be deplored."

In secret, Lucia felt much soft-hearted sympathy for both Miss Bassett and her guest. She could not help wondering how Miss Belinda became responsible for the calamity which had fallen upon her. It really did not seem probable that she had been previously consulted as to to the kind of niece she desired, or that she had in a distant manner, evinced a preference for a niece of this description.

"Perhaps, dear grandmamma," the girl ventured, "it is because Miss Octavia Bassett is so young that——"

"May I ask," inquired Lady Theobald, in felt tones, "how old you are?"

"I was nineteen in—in December."

"Miss Octavia Bassett," said her ladyship, "was nineteen last October, and it is now June. I have not yet found it necessary to apologize for you on the score of youth."

But it was her ladyship who took the initiative and set an evening for entertaining Miss Belinda and her niece, in company with several other ladies, with the best bohea, thin bread and butter, plum-cake and various other delicacies.

"What do they do at such places?" asked Octavia. "Half-past 5 is pretty early."

"We spend some time at the tea-table, my dear," explained Miss Belinda. "And afterwards, we—we converse. A few of us play whist. I do not. I feel as if I were not clever enough, and I get flurried too easily by—by differences of opinion."

"I should think it wasn't very exciting," said Octavia. "I don't fancy I ever went to an entertainment where they did nothing but drink tea and talk."

"It is not our intention or desire to be exciting, my dear," Miss Belinda replied, with mild dignity. "And an improving conversation is frequently most beneficial to the parties engaged in it."

"I'm afraid," Octavia observed, "that I never heard much improving conversation."

She was really no fonder of masculine society than the generality of girls, but she could not help wondering if there would be any young men present, and if, indeed, there were any young men in Slowbridge who might possibly be produced upon festive occasions, even though ordinarily kept in the background. She had not heard Miss Belinda mention any masculine name, so far, but that of the curate of St. James', and, when she had seen him pass the house, she had not found his slim black figure and faint ecclesiastic whiskers especially interesting.

It must be confessed that Miss Belinda suffered many pangs of anxiety in looking forward to her young kinswoman's first appearance in society. A tea at Lady Theobald's house constituted formal presentation to the Slowbridge world. Each young lady, within the pale of genteel society, having arrived at years of discretion, on returning home from boarding-school, was invited to tea at Oldclough Hall. During an entire evening, she was the subject of watchful criticism. Her deportment was remarked, her accomplishments displayed, she performed her new "pieces" upon the piano, she was drawn into conversation by her hostess, and upon the timid modesty of her replies, and the reverence of her listening attitudes, depended her future social status. So it was very natural indeed that Miss Belinda should be anxious.

"I would wear something rather quiet and—and simple, my dear Octavia," she said. "A white muslin, perhaps, with blue ribbons."

"Would you?" answered Octavia. Then, after appearing to reflect upon the matter a few seconds, "I've got one that would do if it's warm enough to wear it. I bought it in New York, but it came from Paris. I've never worn it yet."

"It would be nicer than anything else, my love," said Miss Belinda, delighted to find her difficulty so easily disposed of. Nothing is so charming in the dress of a young girl as pure simplicity. Our Slowbridge young ladies rarely wear anything but white for evening. Miss Chickie assured me, a few weeks ago, that she had made fifteen white muslin dresses all after one simple design of her own."

"I should think that was particularly nice myself," remarked Octavia, impartially. "I should be glad one of the fifteen didn't belong to me. I should feel as if people might say, when I came into a room, 'Good gracious, there's another.'"

"The first was made for Miss Lucia Gaston, who is Lady Theobald's niece," replied Miss Belinda, mildly. "And there are few young ladies in Slowbridge who would not desire to emulate her example."

"Oh," said Octavia, "I dare say she is very nice, and all that, but I don't believe I should care to copy her dresses. I think I should draw the line there."

But she said it without any ill-nature, and sensitive as Miss Belinda was upon the subject of her cherished ideas, she could not take offence.

When the eventful evening arrived, there was excitement in more than one establishment upon High street, and the streets in its vicinity. The stories of the diamonds, the gold-diggers, and the silver-mines had been added to, and embellished, in the most ornate and startling manner. It was well known that only Lady Theobald's fine appreciation of Miss Belinda Bassett's feelings had induced her to extend her hospitalities to that lady's niece.

"I would prefer, my dear," said more than one discreet matron to her daughter, as they attired themselves,——"I would much perfer that you would remain near me during the earlier part of the evening——before we know how this young lady may turn out. Let your manner toward her be kind, but not familiar. It is well to be on the safe side."

What precise line of conduct it was generally anticipated that this gold-digging and silver-mining young person would adopt, it would be difficult to say; it is sufficient that the general sentiments regarding her were of a distrustful, if not timorous nature.

To Miss Bassett, who felt all this in the very air she breathed, the girl's innocence of the condition of affairs was even a little touching. With all her splendor, she was not at all hard to please, and had quite awakened to an interest in the impending social event. She seemed in good spirits, and talked more than was her custom, giving Miss Belinda graphic descriptions of various festal gatherings she had attended in New York, when she seemed to have been very gay indeed, and to have worn very beautiful dresses, and also to have had rather more than her share of partners. The phrases she used and the dances she described were all strange to Miss Belinda, and tended to reducing her to a bewildered condition, in which she felt much timid amazement at the intrepidity of the New York young ladies, and no slight suspicion of the "German"—as a threatrical kind of dance, involving extraordinary figures, and an extraordinary amount of attention from partners of the stronger sex.

It must be admitted, however, that by this time, notwithstanding the various shocks she had received, Miss Belinda had begun to discover in her young guest divers good qualities which appealed to her affectionate and susceptible old heart. In the first place, the girl had no small affections; indeed, if she had been less unaffected she might have been less subject to severe comment. She was good-natured, and generous to extravagance. Her manner towards Mary Anne never ceased to arouse Miss Belinda to interest. There was not any condescension whatever in it, and yet it could not be called a vulgarly familiar manner, it was rather an astonishingly simple manner, somehow suggestive of a subtile recognition of Mary Anne's youth, and ill-luck in not having before her more lively prospects. She gave Mary Anne presents in shape of articles of clothing at which Slowbridge would have exclaimed in horror, if the recipient had dared to wear them; but when Miss Belinda expressed her regret at these indiscretions, Octavia was quite willing to rectify her mistakes.

"Ah, well," she said, "I can give her some money, and she can buy some things for herself." Which she proceeded to do; and when, under her mistress' direction, Mary Anne purchased a stout brown merino, she took quite an interest in her in making it.

"I wouldn't make it so short in the waist and so full in the skirt, if I were you," she said. "There's no reason why it shouldn't fit, you know," thereby winning the housemaiden's undying adoration, and adding much to the shapeliness of the garment.

"I am sure she has a good heart," Miss Belinda said to herself, as the days went by. "She is like Martin in that. I dare say she finds me very ignorant and silly. I often see in her face that she is unable to understand my feeling about things; but she never seems to laugh at me, nor think of me unkindly. And she is very, very pretty, though, perhaps, I ought not to think of that at all."

CHAPTER IX.

WHITE MUSLIN.

As the good little spinster was arraying herself on this particular evening, having laid upon the bed the greater portion of her modest splendor, she went to her wardrobe, and took therefrom the sacred bandbox containing her best cap. All the ladies of Slowbridge wore caps, and all being respectfully plagiarized from Lady Theobald, without any reference to age, size, complexion or demeanor, the result was sometimes a little trying. Lady Theobald's head-dresses were of a severe and bristling order. The of lace which they were composed was induced by some ingenious device to form itself into aggressive quillings, the bows seemed lined with buckram, the strings niether floated nor fluttered.

"To a majestic person, the style is very appropriate," Miss Belinda had said to Octavia, that very day; "but to one who is not so, it is rather trying. Sometimes, indeed, I have almost wished that Miss Chickie would vary a little more in her designs."

Perhaps the sight of the various articles contained in two of the five trunks had inspired these doubts in the dear old lady's breast; it is certain, at least, as she took the best cap up, a faint sigh fluttered upon her lips.

"It is very large—for a small person," she said. "And I am not at all sure that amber is becoming to me."

And just at that moment there came a tap at the door, which she knew was from Octavia.

She laid the cap back in some confusion at being surprised in a moment of weakness.

"Come in, my love," she said.

Octavia pushed the door open, and came in. She had not dressed yet, and had on her wrapper and slippers, which were both of quilted gray silk, gayly embroidered with carnations. But Miss Belinda had seen both wrapper and slippers before, and had become used to their sumptuousness; what she had not seen was the trifle the girl held in her hand.

"See here," she said. "See what I have been making for you."

She looked quite elated, and laughed triumphantly.

"I did not know I could do it until I tried," she said. "I had seen some in New York, and I had the lace by me. And I have enough left to make ruffles for your neck and wrists. It's Mechlin."

"My dear!" exclaimed Miss Belinda. "My dear!"

Octavia laughed again.

"Don't you know what it is?" she said. "It isn't like a Slowbridge cap; but it's a cap, nevertheless. They wear them like this in New York. And I think they are ever so much prettier."

It was true that it was not like a Slowbridge cap, and it was also true that it was prettier. It was a delicate affair of softly quilled lace, adorned here and there with loops of pale satin ribbon.

"Let me try it on," said Octavia, advancing, and in a minute she had done so, and turned Miss Bassett about to face herself in the glass. "There!" she said. "Is that better than——well, than emulating Lady Theobald?"

It was so very pretty, and so becoming, and Miss Belinda was so touched by the girl's innocent enjoyment, that the tears came into her eyes.

"My——my love," she faltered, "it is so beautiful and expensive, that — though indeed I don't know how to thank you—I am afraid I should not dare to wear it."

"Oh," answered Octavia, "that's nonsense, you know. I am sure there's no reason why people shouldn't wear becoming things. Besides, I should be awfully disappointed. I didn't think I could make it, and I'm real proud of it. You don't know how becoming it is."

Miss Belinda looked at her reflection and faltered. It was becoming.

"My love," she protested, faintly, "real Mechlin! There is really no such lace in Slowbridge!"

"All the better," said Octavia, cheerfully. "I'm glad to hear that. It isn't one bit too nice for you."

To Miss Belinda's astonishment, she drew a step nearer to her, and gave one of the satin loops a queer, caressing little touch, which actually seemed to mean something. And then suddenly the girl stooped, with a little laugh, and gave her aunt a light kiss on her cheek.

"There!" she said. "You must take it from me for a present. I'll go and make the ruffles this minute, and you must wear those, too, and let people see how stylish you can be."

And without giving Miss Bassett time to speak, she ran out of the room, and left the dear old lady warmed to the heart, tearful, delighted, frightened.

Life in Chicago.

Visitor (in Chicago)—I should think you would be dreadfully afraid of burglars in a place like this.

Hostess—Burglars? Mercy, no. We don't mind the burglars. It's the police we're afraid of.

Of Two Evils Choose the Lesser.

Mrs. Lumkins—Joshua, I am going to a dentist's to have a tooth pulled out. You mind the baby while I'm gone.

Mr. L. (jumping for his hat)—Say, you mind the baby and I'll go get a tooth pulled, you know.

Many a towering ambition has been crushed, many a cupful of happiness has been converted into dregs of bitterness, from the neglect of a young man to become thoroughly acquainted with a girl before marriage.

Mr. S. M. Donaldson has accomplished the remarkable feat of riding his bicycle from Edinburgh to London, 394 miles, in 2 days, 6 hours and 50 minutes—less than 55 hours—over roads unfavorable from weiness. This is little more than 7 miles an hour, nclusive of time necessarily taken for rest and refreshment.

A humane New York undertaker delayed a funeral the other day. The dead man had not paid for his first wife's burial, and once the undertaker got him in his grip he did not propose to give him up—dead or alive—until the bills were all paid. The matter was settled by the pall-bearers contributing enough to appease the undertaker, who allowed the corpse to proceed to the grave. Undertakers' rings are all of the same metal.

EGYPTIAN CHICKENS.

How They Are Hatched by Millions in Rude Incubators.

The Egyptian chickens are smaller than the American variety and the eggs are only about half as large as those laid by the speckled hens on Uncle Sam's farm. The Egyptians are, however, far in advance of us in the science of raising chickens, says Frank G. Carpenter, and the incubating establishments of the country hatch out eggs by the millions every year. At a hatching establishment near the pyramids the farmers trade fresh eggs for young chicks, and the rate is two eggs per chick. Another artificial egg hatchery turns out 500,000 little chickens every season, and the oven crop of chickens in Egypt amounts, according to figures furnished me by the Consul-General, to more than 20,000,000 of chickens a year. We have about $200,000,000 worth of money invested in the fowl industry in the United States, an amount so large that all the money of Jay Gould could not equal it, and still we have to import more than 16,000,000 dozens of eggs every year. If America would adopt the Egyptian hatching system we could sell eggs instead of buying them, and our farmers might buy little chickens to raise at a price of 20 cents a dozen. More than 20,000,000 of little chickens are sold each year in this way in Egypt, and there is a regular business in chickens just about old enough to walk.

The incubators are rude, one-story buildings, made of undried bricks, so arranged that the eggs are laid upon cut straw in racks in rooms, around the ovens, which are kept fired in during the hatching season. The outside walls are very thick and are built so they retain the heat, and the only thermometer used is the blood of the boy or man who attends the fires. By long practice these men learn just how hot the ovens ought to be kept, and they replenish the fires as the weather demands. A small amount of fuel is needed, and the temperature of the oven is about that of 98 degrees above zero. The fire is built up for eight or ten days before the eggs are put in, to thoroughly warm the hut, and after this time it does not go out during the season, which is from March until May. The eggs are turned four times a day while hatching. The whole outfit of an establishment which hatches over 200,000 chickens a year does not, I am told, cost more than $25, and one man runs the whole machine, keeping the fires, buying and turning the eggs, and selling the chickens. There are, in this incubator, twelve compartments, each 70 feet long, 60 feet wide and 16 feet high, and each of these compartments will hold 7,500 eggs at a time, or 90,000 eggs in all. It produced last year more than 230,000 chickens and did the work of more than 20,000 hens.

From Penury to Affluence.

B. K. Jamison, the banker, whose wealth nobody exactly knows, went to Philadelphia in his boyhood without money enough in his pocket to pay a week's board, says the News.

Director William S. Stokley knows what it is to make candy with his own hands and sell it over a little counter in his own shop.

Postmaster-General Wanamaker began his business life as a clerk in a Market street store upon a mighty small salary. He used to pay five cents for his daily dinner, consisting of a piece of pie and a glass of milk.

Frank Siddall, the great soap manufacturer, and the owner of some of the choicest property on the Jersey coast, to say nothing of mineral interests in Georgia, for years kept a rather insignificant grocery store near Eighth and Callowhill streets.

John B. Gest, Vice-President of the Fidelity Trust Company, used to wait for law cases in a little office, generally in vain.

George W. Childs worked for a long time in this city at such a salary that he only paid twenty-five cents for his noonday meals by practicing rigid economy.

Anthony J. Drexel, who is worth more than twenty-five millions of dollars, was the son of a poor portrait painter and thought himself lucky when he got a trifling stipend as a clerk in his father's little brokerage office.

The Unnecessary Verbiage of Law.

The world has outrun the courts and legal technicalities have outlived their usefulness. The progress of the people has been toward common-sense methods in all things, and the lawyer's "whereases," "aforesaids," and "parties of the first part" must be relegated to oblivion. There is a demand springing up for plain, direct English. There is really no sound reason why, to a man of ordinary intelligence, legal documents should be unintelligible. The technical verbiage employed is a relict of the age when that which was mysterious and could not be understood was esteemed to be beyond the comprehension of the common herd. The use of uncommon English in purely business circles would not be endured. Why, then, should the transfer of a piece of property be a process so labyrinthine and so mysterious that a man of sound sense cannot fathom it? It has been estimated that the dropping of the letter u in such words as honour, labour and the like has added to the world each year what is equivalent to the productive capacity of 500 able-bodied men. What would we not gain if from every legal paper and from every legal suit there should be removed that vast mass of superfluity, that antique verbiage, that bulk of repetition and solemn senselessness that now enwraps them as its shell enwraps the clam?

Self Preservation.

Wealthy Old Gent—What! Marry my daughter? You are being supported by your father.

Suitor—Yes, sir, but my father is tired supporting me, and I thought I'd better get into another family.

Summer resort extremities. Mattie Bond (on the verandah of the Mountain House)—Here comes a man across the fields. Chorus of feminine shrieks—Oh! Oh!! Oh!!! Oh!!!! A man! a man! Where?" Mattie Bond—No, it's nothing but a scarecrow after all. Chorus—The mean thing! Mattie Bond—Well, you needn't get mad about it. That's more than any of you have discovered so far.—Time.

ROMAN GIRL AND DOLL.

Touching Scene Brought to Light in the Ancient Italian City.

In May last the workmen who were digging the foundation for the new law courts in Rome discovered a sarcophagus buried thirty feet below the surface. Immediately the telephone called to the spot the members of the Archæological Commission; scientific and literary men who watch with jealous care all the excavations made in the Eternal City. Under their direction it was carefully raised and opened. Within lay the skeleton of a young girl, with the remains of the linen in which she had been wrapped, some brown leaves from the myrtle wreath with which, emblematic of her youth, she had been crowned in death. On her hands were four rings, of which one was the double betrothal ring of plain gold, and another with Filetus, the name of her betrothed, engraved upon it. A large and most exquisite amethyst brooch, in Etruscan setting of the finest work, carved amber pins, and a gold necklet with white small pendants were lying about. But what is most strange, as being almost unique, was a doll of oak wood, beautifully carved, the joints articulated so that the legs and arms and hands move on sockets, the hands and feet daintily cut, with small and delicate nails. The features and the hair were carved out in the most minute and careful way, the hair waving low on the forehead, and being bound with a fillet. On the outside of the sarcophagus was sculptured her name, Tryphæna Creperia, and a touching scene, doubtless faithfully representing her parting with her parents. She is lying on a low bed and striving to raise herself on her left arm to speak to her heartbroken father, who stands leaning on her bedstead, his head bowed with grief, while her mother sits on the bed, her head covered, weeping. It seems but yesterday, so natural is the scene, and yet it was nearly 18 centuries ago that these stricken parents laid so tenderly away their dearly beloved daughter with her ornaments and her doll.—Youths' Companion.

Earning a Million Dollars.

What about the distribution of wealth? Fortunes such as the world never saw since the days when "great estates ruined Italy" are growing up in the American Republic. We have four or five men who are worth from one hundred millions to two hundred millions apiece, we have sixty or seventy whose fortunes are estimated at from twenty millions to a hundred millions, while as for simple millionaires they are far too numerous to be counted. Consider what the possession of a single million means. Consider how long it would take an American mechanic or American laborer—I will not say such protected American laborers as the coal miners of Illinois or Pennsylvania—after supporting himself and his family, to save a million dollars. How many lifetimes? For though he were to live to the age of Methusalah he could not save a million dollars. If you would get any intelligible idea of what these fortunes of millions, tens of millions, scores of millions and hundreds of millions really mean, figure up how many workingmen's incomes—deducting of course the necessary subsistence of a man and family, for even the slave owner had to allow that to the slave—it would take to make such incomes as these fortunes represent.

And look again. While these monstrous fortunes are gathering in the hands of a few, one has but to read our daily papers to see how familiar we are becoming with conditions that we once thought possible only in effete monarchies of the old world, and could not exist in the free air of our democratic republic—with tramps and paupers and beggars; with charities that show the need of charity, with destitution and starvation, with crimes and suicides caused by want, or fear of want; with a struggle for existence on the part of great classes of the people that makes life hard, bitter and ofttimes imbruting—a struggle which grows not less, but more intense as these great fortunes go rolling up.—Henry George at Baltimore.

The Syndicate of Specalists.

The exposure of Graham's and of Brodie's fraudulent performances at Niagara Falls has had the unexpected effect of throwing the light of publicity upon a little syndicate of newspaper reporters in Buffalo, the members of which have been lending themselves to the schemes of imposters of the Brodie and Graham stripe. These reporters have acted as the correspondents of the papers in nearly all the large cities of the country, and it has been their duty to telegraph "specials" at rates which are considered highly remunerative. Their connection with Buffalo papers give them unusual facilities for news gathering and had they been content with the legitimate business they might have done very well after the manner of their brethern in other cities. But they were too ambitious. They tried to establish a "corner" in news and it must be confessed that they were running matters pretty much as they chose, when they tried to foist upon the world the story of Graham's adventure in in a barrel. It was a clever enough "fake" and paid the syndicate well and they did equally well with the Brodie story, but then came a reaction. It was soon proved that the reports were absurdly untruthful and the papers in other cities that had been duped by their Buffalo correspondents began to make inquiries. It was not long before the real facts in the case were discovered and now it looks very much as if another syndicate must go down before a burst of public indignation.

The boys have been bright and enterprising and have seriously impeded the regular channel for news, but they made the mistake which many older men have made of not knowing where to draw the line.—Rochester Democrat.

Knowledge Costs Money.

Irate Patron—See here, sir, I dropped a nickle into this machine, and nothing came out.

Agent—If nothing came out, that shows it's empty.

"But, sir, what do I get for my nickle?"

"Information."

Fond Father—Sir, my daughter is the apple of my eye. She shall continue under her father's wings. Van Gall—Thanks. I was just going to speak about that. Can you give us the northwest wing?

The Girl That Pounds the Keys.

My office of late has seemed brighter,
More cheerful by far than it was;
It may be the pretty typewriter
Who sits near my desk is the cause.

A radiant, dashing young creature;
In typewriting circles a belle;
Although I'm unable to teach her
To punctuate rightly or spell.

Her mouth like a half-opened rose is,
Her hair rivals gold in its hue,
Tip-tilted her dear little nose is,
Her eyes are a heavenly blue.

I really should feel lost without her;
For while there's no cause for alarm,
There's something attractive about her,
A thrilling, intangible charm.

Her typewritten letters are fearful,
With errors they thickly are strewed;
I scold her, and she becomes tearful,
And thinks I am awfully rude.

She breaks into silvery laughter
As soon as forgiven, and I've Rewritten no end of them after
She's gone—she leaves promptly at five

My wife, who is somewhat suspicious,
Dropped into my office to-day,
And found—well, I thought it judicious
To send my typewriter away.

I really shall feel lost without her,
For while I intended no harm,
My wife noticed something about her
That filled her dear soul with alarm.

Mother and Child.

"Where is the girl that you were?" said the child,
And the mother smiled back to her lifted eyes,
"She lives where the faded violets go,
And the old sun shines in the skies!"

"Where last year's birds sing last year's songs?
She caught at the fancy as children will.
"But if you should meet with the girl that you were,
Do you think you would know her still?"

"I remember her eyes and her waving hair;
I see them now as I look at you.
My little daughter, when one dream dies
Another sometimes comes true!"

"Mothers are better than girls, I think;
They wipe your tears and find out the pain,
And smile when you smile—pray do not go back
If you have the chance again!"

"Ah! there is no fear of that my sweet,
A mother forevermore and a day
I shall be. We will let the girl that I was
With your faded violets stay."

The Yacht Race.

A rattling breeze from out the west
Stretches like drumheads every sail.
Each wave beats like a muffled flail
Upon the glist'ning hulls that breast
The endless droves of tossing manes
Hurrying across the wind-swayed plains.

Haul taut each sheet until it sings
Like chorus from an Æolian harp;
Now see the long bows, clean and sharp,
Rush forward, sped by tireless wings
That cleave their way into the wind,
While long waves stretch away behind.

What grander scene of power than this
To feel the sea's strong shoulder pressed
Against the helm, as though 'twould wrest
It from thy grasp: while salt sprays kiss
The wings that glance across the swells
And scuppers foam like boiling wells.

Ten miles to windward, cross and cross
The white fleet beats towards the mark,
While lemp and canvas strain. Now, hark.
How the glad waves toss and toss
The bell buoy breaks upon the ear
Its brazen note more clear and clear.

And now it mounts upon a swell.
Another reach and it's a-lee,
Now swirling in the heavy sea.
The leader turns, with sheets eased well.
And the next moment bursts her cloud
Of spinnaker athwart her shroud.

Then like some downy, snow white fleck,
She's blown across the blue expanse.
The fresh wind seems to pause in trance,
To those who stand upon her deck,
The seas to cease their headlong race
In homage to her matchless grace.

The breeze dies with the setting sun,
But not until the trembling air,
Ruffling the waters here and there,
Has waited on its chosen one
Across a goal of gleaming gold,
And then the conquering pinions fold

The Art of Prolonging Life.

Dr. Robson Roose in Popular Science Monthly.

Somewhat different advice must be given with regard to bodily exercises in their reference to longevity. Exercise is essential to the preservation of health; inactivity is a potent cause of wasting and degeneration. The vigor and equality of the circulation, the functions of the skin, and the aeration of the blood, are all promoted by muscular activity, which thus keeps up a proper balance and relation between the important organs of the body. In youth, the vigor of the system is often great that if one organ be sluggish another part will make amends for the deficiency by acting vicariously, and without any consequent damage to itself. In old age, the tasks cannot be thus shifted from one organ to another; the work allotted to each sufficiently taxes its strength, and vicarious action cannot be performed without mischief. Hence the importance of maintaining as far as possible, the equable action of all the bodily organs, so that the share of the vital processes assigned to each shall be properly accomplished. For this reason exercise is an important part of the conduct of life in old age; but discretion is absolutely necessary. An old man should discover by experience how much exercise he can take without exhausting his powers, and should be careful never to exceed the limit. Old persons are apt to forget that their staying powers are much less than they once were and that, while a walk of two or three miles may prove easy and pleasurable, the addition of a return journey of similar length will seriously overtax the strength.

The Doctor Was There.

The curtain had risen on the last act of the play and the diabolical plot of the villain was about to be exposed in all its hideousness, says the Chicago Tribune.

Suddenly there was a commotion near the entrance and a voice called out breathlessly:

"Is Dr. Kallowmell in the audience?"

With the grave, preoccupied manner of a man on whose skill the life of some fellow creature might depend, the doctor arose from his seat near the stage and passed slowly down the aisle.

"What is it?" he asked.

"Doctor," said the breathless as he drew from his breast pocket a of folded documents, "I'm Spotcash & Co's. new collector. Would it be convenient for you to settle that little bill this evening?"

The J. W. Morrissey English Grand Opera Company sang "Carmen" last week for the first time.

O, IT WAS PITIFUL,

Near a Whole Cityfull, Friend She Had None.

The story of Mary Mullins, the young mother, who was turned out on the street with her two children, and whose baby died in her arms while she was sitting on a doorstep, is a pitiful one in many ways The young woman had been apparently deserted by her husband, and her friends had advised her to put her children in a charitable institution. But she could not bring herself to part with the little ones, and being feeble after a long illness she became unable to work for them. Her baby being sick she took it to a hospital, where she was told that it had bronchitis, but that it was against the rules to take it in, though the poor mother explained her helplessness and lack of shelter for it. It was against the rules to take in a sick baby, which was morally certain to die if subjected to further exposure, and which would be so exposed, because the mother was homeless and destitute. But it was not against the rules for this homeless creature to crouch all through a cold night on the doorsteps of a house, until her baby died on her bosom. Then, however, the "rules" came into play again. The sergeant at the police station where she went "could do nothing for her." She must go to the morgue, and, being penniless, must walk there, carrying her dead baby, after a night in the streets.

At the morgue the "rules" again confronted her. They could not receive the little body without a permit from the coroner, and the coroner could not be found; so the wretched woman had to visit another police station, and there, after being at last allowed to surrender the dead baby at the morgue, the best the police could do for her was to lock her up. Apparently it is against the "rules" to be destitute, to be homeless, to be bereaved. The cruelest blow that can fall on a mother is, according to the "rules," only a reason for treating that mother as a criminal. Even though no charge whatever can be brought against her, she must be dragged before a police justice with the ruffianry of the night, and may count herself lucky if she is discharged and permitted to take her grief, misery and indigence back into the streets that offer her neither food, shelter, nor consolation. That this should be possible in one of the most charitable and tender-hearted communities is, to say the least, strange, but it is not less evident that red tape is largely accountable for it. This baby's life should have been saved. The hospital surgeon who declared it against the rules to take the infant in, no matter what the alternative, should have assumed the responsibility of overriding all rules in such a case. The police sergeant, the morgue keeper and the coroner are doubtless equally sheltered by their regulations; but is there not room for amendment in rules which produce results of this kind?

Of course it may be said that Mary Mullins was to blame for not putting her children in an asylum. But for the credit of human nature there are mothers who cling to their babies with a passionate affection, and systems and institutions which make no provision for such cases are defective. What is a poor mother to do who finds herself in Mary Mullins' position? Experience seems to warrant the conclusion that if she had gone to any other shelter or asylum at that hour of the night she would have been refused admission. Even in the daytime she would probably have been required to go through forms and ceremonies, and in most cases she would have been made to part with her children as an indispensable condition. Is it not time that some provision should be made somewhere in our complicated system of charities and correction, or in the auxiliary network of private and semi-public institutions, for cases of urgency such as this one? Should there not be somewhere in the city a place—hospital or asylum—where the "rules" were broad and flexible enough to include the preservation of a baby's life, suddenly exposed through the heartlessness or the helplessness of others? To expect so much relief does not seem extravagant, and we are sure the people of New York would be glad to hear that a second case of the Mary Mullins type had been rendered impossible.—New York Tribune.

Imperfections of Imbeciles.

A peculiar tendency in idiots to imperfections and disease in the teeth has been noticed by several physicians and it has been studied by Madame Sollier in a hundred cases of idiots taken at random. The multiplicity and variety of the dental lesions were remarkable and the conclusion has been drawn that idiocy, with or without epilepsy, pre-disposes to arrests of development and to anomalous dentition. The effect rarely appears in the first teeth, but almost wholly in the second.

Germany wants Rapid Exit for Criminals.

Emperor William has instructed the Ministry of Justice to report on execution by electricity. He favors this method of execution if it will produce painless death with absolute certainty. He has sent the Ministry copious notes on the American and European scientists' inquiries into the matter. The Emperor believes electricity ought not to be applied unless the preparation for the execution be short and simpler than for hanging or beheading. He thinks he methods hitherto suggested are clumsy.

A Foregone Conclusion.

Canvasser—I have here a work——
Master of the house——I can't read.
Canvasser—But you have children——
Master of the house—I have no children (triumphantly). Nothing but a cat.
Canvasser—Well, you want something to throw at the cat. (He took it.)

COCOANUT FIBER AS ARMOR.

This Waste Product Develops Great Resistance to Bullets.

A possible use to which cocoanut fiber may be applied in the future is to form backing substance for the iron plates of men-of-war vessels. The fiber is first powdered and then, before it is quite dry, subjected to pressure, when the natural viscidity of the cellular substance of the nut causes it to cohere and form a plate much like millboard in appearance, but a great deal more brittle, says the London Court Journal. If a hole is made in this material, and then water be applied to the portion adjacent to the puncture, it immediately swells to such an extent as to fill the hole.

Experiments with bullets varying from one-half to three quarters of an inch in diameter have been made upon a plate of this material 18 inches square by three quarters of an inch thick, and with very satisfactory results. Whether, however, the substance would really prove efficacious as regards cannon shot has not yet been tried. Should it prove of use in such cases, it could be supplied in large quantities, for millions of tons of cocoanut fiber are annually allowed to go to waste in India for want of use.

Vastness of the British Dominions.

History affords no parallel to the position of the British Empire. Great Britain stands facile princeps among the nations. The British flag floats over one-eighth of the habitable globe; our Queen rules over one-sixth of the world's population; and our country enjoys one-third of the world's trade. Canada has an area equal to that of Europe without Spain, and comes fourth on the world's list of ship-owning nations. Australia is about four-fifths the size of Europe, and contains the elements of an almost fabulous wealth. South Africa, with an area almost as large as Austro-Hungary, or nearly four times that of England, has so fertile a soil and so excellent a climate that, although its progress has been slower than that of the other great colonies, its future will entitle it to rank as fourth only in importance to ourselves. India is as large as the whole of Europe if we omit Russia, and contains a much larger population, amongst which order is easily maintained; for while at home one policeman is required for every 635 persons, in India only one policeman is needed for every 1,200 people. Thus India, with its one and a half millions of square miles and its two hundred and fifty millions of inhabitants, must be regarded as an empire in itself. These magnificent possessions, together with some sixty smaller territories lying on the scattered fringe of many oceans, irresistibly lead us to see that the boast of the brave Spanish soldier, that the sun never sets on the immense empire of Charles V., receives its most forcible application when applied to the dominions of our beloved Queen. The powerful world kingdoms of Assyria and Persia fade into insignificance as compared with the British dominions. The imprint of Rome's Empire is indelibly fixed on all the most civilized nations of Europe. The dominions of Rome extend from the Straits of Gibraltar to the Euphrates, from the mountains of Caledonia, the banks of the Rhine and the Danube, to the border of the great African desert and to the first cataracts of the Nile. But the British dominions exceed fourfold those of ancient Rome. They today exceed by an eighth the vast territories of all the Russias. France is a great country, boasting colonial possessions, but the British possessions are sixteen times larger than those of France, and forty times as extensive as the powerful dominions of United Germany, and nearly three times the size of the United States. These facts enable us to appreciate the eloquent words of Daniel Webster, and to see in the British dominion, "a power to which, for purposes of foreign conquest and subjugation, Rome, in the height of her glory, is not to be compared; a power which has dotted over the surface of the whole globe with her possessions and military posts, whose morning drum beat, following the sun and keeping company with the hours, circles the earth with one continuous and unbroken strain of the martial airs of England." With so vast an empire occasional local wars are inevitable. But never in the history of the world have the blessings of peace been preserved over so wide an area as the lands over which the sceptre of our Queen exercises beneficent sway.—Westminster Review.

Blessing of Odontalgia.

The toothache causes its possessor to forget all other troubles, especially the troubles of others. There may be a flood or fire in the next town which swallows up millions of property and hundreds of lives; murder may run amuck past his very door; the entire family of his nearest neighbor may be starving to death. Its effects him not at all.—Boston Transcript.

Undoubtedly Healthy.

"Is this house healthy?" said the prospective tenant to the real estate man.

"Healthy? well I should say so."

"You speak very positively."

"Yes, I have a right to. The last family in it had the smallpox from the father to the youngest baby, and not one of them died."

A Society Mystery.

Mrs. De Style—My dear, your wardrobe is three months behind the fashion. Why don't you have your husband buy you some new dresses?

Married Daughter—He can't afford it; he has no money.

Mrs. De Style—No money? Well! I can't imagine what on earth you married him for.

Got Back Home.

Mr. Blinks (in dairy restaurant, New York city)—I'm most starved for a bowl of milk and some berries with real cream on 'em. Bring me a double order.

Waiter—Yes, sah. Been summering on a farm, I s'pose, sah?

A man may have a mansion in the skies and a castle or two in Spain, but unless he has a house up town and a few thousands to run it he will not amount to anything in this utilitarian age.

—The season is at hand when the inexperienced fool goes hunting and looks down the barrel of his gun to see if it is loaded. No flowers.

IT WAS LOADED.

A Cigar That Went Off at the Wrong Time

The small advertising man with the large mustache has been at it again, says the Chicago Herald. This time he did not know that it was loaded. He never smokes a cigar that is given him, and this is why he escaped disaster himself, but he made an enemy. The other day an advertiser gave him a cigar. He filed it away in his vest pocket with the stereotyped remark: "I'll smoke this after dinner." When he reached the office he met a reporter who had on several occasions "joshed" him. Here was a chance for him to get even. He had sized the cigar up as a bad one, and he gave it to the scribe, expecting him to light it at once. Instead of doing so he put it in his pocket and said: "Thanks, old man, I'll smoke this after dinner.' About an hour later the reporter met an editor. He thought of the cigar, and asked the editor if he would smoke. The editor took the weed, thanked the reporter and said he would smoke it after dinner. The editor did not meet anyone who smoked before he went home, and after dinner he sat out on his front porch and lit the cigar. In about three minutes it exploded. A man who lived across the street thought the editor was shooting at him.

The editor is mad. Part of his mustache was singed off. The next morning he nailed the reporter to the cross. The reporter declared that he did not know it was loaded, but the editor did not believe him. Then the reporter threatened to lick the small advertising man on sight. The only man who knew the cigar was loaded was the advertiser, who had designs on the small advertising man. But he missed his mark. He shot at the counting-room and hit the editorial staff.

Persecuted Armenian Christians.

A prominent Armenian in New York city, referring to the persecution of his countrymen by the Kurds says: Turkish officials pretend that the troubles in Armenia are due to Russian and other foreign intriguers, but Christian missionaries know that the Kurds are to blame. Responsibility for the trouble was also thrown upon the Persian Government, owing to the fact that the Kurds were once subjects of that Power, but the Persian Minister in London promptly disclaimed all responsibility in the matter. The Armenians could be saved if the European nations would only compel Turkey to observe article 63 of the Treaty of Berlin, by which the Turkish Government is bound to protect them. With the Syrians, however, the case is different. They have absolutely no claim to protection from any quarter, and though they number about two hundred thousand, as against 150 000 Kurds, unarmed and averse to warfare they are no match for the nomadic, well equipped, freebooting Kurds. By massacres and incursions these Kurds live. They delight in slaughter, and spare neither woman nor child. Young Armenians and Syrian maidens are frequently carried off by them. Whole villages are terrorized, and when they swoop down on the inhabitants the end of those villages is at hand. Their hand is against every unbeliever, and yet no man's hand seems to be against them. Some of their great men are Agas, and govern the poor Syrians as they please. The Armenians hope to gain the sympathy of foreign nations by means of their Patriarch, their unions and their press. Their Patriarch, who resides in Constantinople, recently threatened to resign on account of these very troubles, and was with difficulty induced to retain his position. Their principal newspaper is published in Marseilles. It contains true accounts of the late massacre, and shows how shamefully Turkey is violating the pledge which she gave at the Treaty of Berlin. Their unions are scattered all over the world. In America there are about 9,000 Armenians, and they have a strong union in this city. The Turkish Government is powerful, and will not permit Armenians, wherever they may be, to become insubordinate or rebellious with impunity. In these unions, however, work is being done that the Sultan and his Ministers little dream of.

Albert Victor Would Slay Tigers.

Prince Alber Victor, known variously as "Collars and cuffs" and "Eddie," is going to India on a tiger-hunting expedition. As it is his first outing alone, he is said to be very enthusiastic and eager. He is also keen to try his hand on big game and to emulate the example of his father, who proved himself a nervy hunter and good shot in India many years ago. Thus far in his young career Albert Victor has never had an opportunity to bring down anything larger than a stag. Preparations are already being made to secure a sufficient supply of big game, and the best tiger preserves are to be left unmolested until the arrival of the Royal hunter. There is very little danger, however, that England will be desolated by the loss of Albert Victor, or that a prince of the blood will fall a prey to a king of the jungle. He will be accompanied by an army of elephants and beaters, and when the game is sprung the rifles of a score of expert marksmen will be kept fixed on the beast until the princeling's gun goes off. As a general thing on these occasions, the frightened tiger bends all his energies to escaping, but if he should turn upon the Royal party he would be filled so full of lead in a second that it would take two elephants to lift his carcass.

All the Same.

Little Girl—Can you darn your stockings papa?

Papa—facetiously—No, dear; but I can knit my brows.

Vengeance.

Returned Traveller—I have often thought of that young Mr. Tease, and how he used to torment Miss Auburn about her red hair. Did she ever get even with him?

Old Friend—Long ago. She married him.

Curious, Isn't It?

When a poet says, "Years ago I loved a fair and gentle maiden," everybody is interested. When a prose man makes the same confession everybody calls him a clam.

Somebody with a taste for figures has made the calculation that in the year 1990 the United States will have a population of 1,000,000,000. This paragraph should be cut out and preserved for reference at that time.

From our own Correspondent.

Although the weather was not such as would conduce to the successful issue of our fair, we are pleased to state that it turned out far in advance of the most sanguine anticipations.

The elements ceased their revelry about 1 o'clock and old king Sol. indulged us with a few hours of his pleasantry which was taken advantage of with avidity by those who had exhibits to make, and those who had the welfare of this most laudable enterprise in our community. On the grounds there was a goodly number of spectators, quite conspicuously sprinkled with the fair sex. The show of cattle, sheep and pigs was not as good as we are sure it could be, if more interest was taken by our farmers in the selection and care of this kind of stock. In the horse ring the exhibits were numerous and good, especially the year and two year old class of colts, and it is fair to say that they would do ample justice to any county show. The general purpose class was fair but not enough competition to make it interesting. A fine team of blacks carried of the first prize for roadsters which they much deserved. In the hack class there was great rivalry, a great number competing, Mr. Cairns, of the Crown Hotel, got 1st and Mr. Dan McLean, of Markdale, 2nd. This we think was a very fair decision, although Mr. Riley thinks he or Mr. Cairns got in the wrong class. Jimmy Atkinson was awarded a special prize for the dashing manner in which he passed Mr Riley and others on the ring with his "Indian." In the hall the show of fruit was not up to former years, but vegetables, etc., were good and well selected. Fine arts, etc., were well represented. The show of fowl was very good, but sorry to say their shelter was not the best that might be provided. A new hall and ground and two days' show is now the thing that should be agitated by the directors, and we think if the matter was gone about right it could be done without much trouble. Of course a united effort is what is wanted. On the whole the fair surpassed former years and we think the directors have reason to congratulate themselves, and that it should satisfy the most fastidious.

It is with deep regret that we report the death of Archibald McArthur, generally known as "Uncle Archy," who has been sick for two weeks. For some days it was thought he would recover but a weakened constitution from old age could not withstand the onward march of a most debilitating disease, and the deceased passed away without pain or suffering on Wednesday the 2nd Oct., at 3 o'clock. Mr. McArthur was a kind and pious old gentleman, of an affable disposition, and one that was universally loved. He will be greatly missed by those who knew him, especially his friends, with whom we deeply sympathize.

Mr. Chas. McMillan has put on the paint again and is waging war against tree-hooting cows. Charley vows eternal vengence on that satanic brute clothed in black and white that reams the village, monarch of all she surveys.

Mr. John O'Hearn and Miss Sullivan, daughter of Thos. Sullivan, all of Irish Lake, were married here on last Wednesday morning by Rev. J.J. Feuny.

Al is back from seeing his best girl.

Jim. says that that things is wo-wo-working gra gra great at the sta sta station.

VIDI.

From our other Correspondent.

All nature was clothed in a mantle of snowy white, on Sunday morning.

Mr. C. McLeod, a young man who went out west some years ago, and has travelled extensively in western Canada and U. S., is back home again and has purchased a farm near Priceville.

"Big Dan" threshed his wild mustard last week.

Mr. Jos. Aussum, while out driving one day last week, was thrown from the buggy and injured his shoulder. His horse took fright at a black dog in the western limits of the town. Said dog has proven a great nuisance to a number of people already. Somebody's dog will get into trouble yet.

Mr. W. McAuley has been home for a few days with his family. Mr. McA. seems to like his new farm in Algoma, and intends moving his family to their new home as soon as he gets it fitted up to receive them.

Mrs. A. Ostrander and daughters, we understand, carried off first prize for both bread and butter. I tell you what, if I were in want of a wife I would naturally go to a house where both good bread and butter are manufactured.

Mr. Duncan Muir has been the last few days engaged thrashing for the small crofters around town.

The Ginsing.

Editor Flesherton Advance.

DEAR SIR.—An article which appeared in your paper from a correspondent in Eugenia should be corrected. The plant that we are in search of is called Ginsing. Grey Co. twenty years ago was full of it; the clearing of the land, the pasturing of woods with cattle, the travelling hunter, the Indians all combined have made it very scarce in this Co. We find traces of it every where, just enough to show us what it was once. There is no use for this root in the Dominion or U.S., its market is China; used by the Chinee in his religion. It is worth in Hong Kong from $75 to $100 per lb. Bought by the Yankees for speculation, company's trusts and syndicates rule the market. No man of small means can get around them. We are obliged to acept the speculators' prices—as a consequence our prices are $1.50, dried, 40 cts per lb. green. The plant cannot be cultivated. It grows only where the sugar maple tree grows and on rich dark loam soil. Interesting accounts of this plant, its use, etc., can be found in any botanical work published in either country Mr. Williams, of Maxwell, has a valuable book which gives a good account of ginsing. It can been seen by calling at his store.

Side hills, ravines, glens, etc., is good ground for this plant. At one time farmers in this county could have paid for their land without ever taking a stick of timber off; the amount of root which grew on the soil would pay for every acre. In regard to the specimens of mineral we have obtained, we can give no definite statements as yet. The best we have came from the farm of Mr. Cooper, 12th concession, Artemesia. Will give you further accounts of our work should you wish it. CHARLES J. LYNDON,

General News.

Owing to the prevalence of measles the Port Arthur public schools have been closed.

The contract for the Owen Sound harbor works has been awarded to Mr. R T Sutton, of Toronto, the lowest tenderer.

The S S. Geographe, Montreal to Southampton, collided with the Nova Scotia sailing vessel Minnie Swatt 30 miles off St. Pierre on Tuesday at midnight. Both vessels went to the bottom, and a number of lives are believed to have been lost.

The executioner brought from France some weeks ago to guilotine a murderer named Nael on the Island of St. Pierre, has fled from the island to escape death at the hands of the citizens. Since the execution several attempts have been made upon his life with poison. Word has just been received from the island that indignation had been so thoroughly aroused against the executioner that he was obliged to seek refuge on board the French man-of war Drac, returning to Three burglers were captured Thursday morning in Toronto about 3 o'clock in the act of plying their craft. They appeared in Police Court the same day and were sentenced to five years each in the Penitentiary.

Mrs McRae, wife of the eminent Presbyterian clergyman at St. John, N B, has been poisoned by strychnine put into candy sent her husband by mail. Two other St John ministers received poisoned candy in the same way. The case, which is most mysterious, is similar to the one at Galt, when little Meta Cherry was murdered, and poisoned candy was sent to the family of Rev. John Ridley. Later advices state that an arrest has been made.

MORE POISONED CANDIES.

Suspicious Death of a Presbyterian Minister's Wife.

AFTER THE CLERGYMEN.

A last Thursday night's St. John, N.B., despatch says: Yesterday's special despatch to the Empire told of the terribly sudden death of Mrs. McRae, wife of the eminent Presbyterian clergyman in this city. Events which have since come to light excite horrible suspicion, pointing to a foul and most cowardly murder. The facts, as ascertained up to this time, are these: Yesterday morning the mail carrier delivered at the house a small, neatly wrapped parcel addressed to Rev. Dr. McRae. The doctor was absent at Pictou, and Mrs. McRae opened the parcel, which contained a few gum drops and other candy. It was after eating a few of these that she was seized with convulsions. Dr. Christie, who lives directly across the street, was called at once. She had two spasms after that, and was dead in two minutes. The rigidity of the muscles and sudden contraction so impressed the doctor that when a little later he met the family physician he told him that he would call it a case of strychnine poisoning if the circumstances could possibly admit of it. The other physician went home, when shortly afterward he was visited by young McRae, who had discovered the candy and brought with him what remained. The parcel was immediately placed in the hands of the Government analyst, who found one piece covered with strychnine crystals. Drs. Christie and McLaren notified the coroner, who at once ordered a post mortem. The body was examined accordingly and portions of the stomach and other organs preserved for analysis. The inquest has been adjourned until Monday. Meanwhile Solicitor-General Pugsley is making inquiry into the case. On the same morning when the parcel was delivered to Mrs. McRae, one of the same character was received from the postman at the house of Thomas Deinstadt, a Methodist clergyman of this city. Mrs. Deinstadt, opened the parcel, her husband being in bed. Her little girl, seeing the contents, followed her about the house begging for a taste, but her mother, feeling some suspicion which she is not yet able to account for, refused to give her any. The suspicions seem to have been shared by her husband, who took the package to the analyist who still has it, but declines to give any information. Mr. Deinstadt says he noticed an incision in one of the candies. It occurred to him that some person, annoyed at his plain speaking, may have taken a fancy to give him a dose of physic, or some such thing. He had no thought of murder. A third parcel of the same character, addressed in the same hand, was delivered to Rev. Mr. Desoyres, of St. John Episcopal Church. This clergyman had no suspicions. He opened the package, and noting contents, concluded to lay it by for some children who were about the house. However, he bit one piece in two and found it excessively bitter, quickly spitting it out, and supposing it might be quassia he took the confectionery to Dr. Harding, who lived near. The doctor at once pronounced the drug to be strychnine and handed it into the analyst Bust, who says there was enough poison in the one drop to kill a man at once. No explanation of the cause of the plot can be made. The three clergymen are in no way associated with each other and have given no common offence to any class of people.

A HAPPY LIFE.

The Czar in Constant Terror of Plots Against His Person.

A Berlin cable says: Official telegrams say the Czar will start for Berlin next Thursday. Mr. Schirinkine, Chief of the Czar's secret police, passed through Berlin to-day on his way to Kiel. He is accompanied by the inspector of Imperial trains. The Czar's special train, once owned by the Empress Eugenie, lies at the station here, having come from Wirballen. There are swarms of Russian police here, at Kiel, and at the stations along the proposed route. Russian troops line the rails from Wirballen to Moscow. The precautions taken far excel those on the occasion of the former visit of the Czar, and are due to his intense fears of an attempt upon his life. The Czarina leaves Copenhagen October 12th for Konigsberg, rejoining the Czar at some point on the homeward journey. Only Court Minister Worontzow Daschoff, and Aides-de Camp Gens. Tchereine and Richter will accompany the Czar. The Czar will accord Prince Bismarck an interview. The Czar will pass 48 hours between Potsdam and Berlin. Nothing is expected to result from his meeting with Bismarck. The Moscow newspapers ridicule the idea that the Czar will accept any conciliatory overtures, unless they are well backed by solid concessions.

A Blind M.P. Suicides.

A London cable of Sunday says: Sir William Tindal Robinson, jun., member of Parliament for Brighton, committed suicide this mording at his Brighton residence by cutting his throat with a razor. He was elected to Parliament in 1886 without opposition as a Conservative, in spite of his unwillingness, on account of blindness, to be a candidate. A short time ago he sprained his ankle and was compelled to take to his bed. He was attacked with other ailments and became mentally depressed, though none of his friends imagined he was not in his right mind. He was a fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, London. In 1882 he became chairman of the Brighton Conservative Association. He was knighted last year. He was a man of considerable means as well as ability.

They Quarrelled About Jack.

A New York despatch of Sunday says: Julia O'Connor, aged 14, died last night from the effects of a beating she received two months ago at the hands of a girl about her own age named Maggie Miller. The girls quarrelled about a lad named Jack, who paid attention to both of them. The police are searching for Maggie on a charge of homicide.

—Man is not perfect, of course, but so long as woman is it does not matter much.

THE NAVASSA SLAUGHTER.

Unarmed Whites Shot Down by Infuriated Negroes.

A Baltimore despatch says: The particulars of the riot at Navassa, September 14th, have been received by the Navassa Phosphate Co. from Acting-Superintendent D. C. Smith. On the morning of the 14th the negroes rose in insurrection and killed four officers, Thomas A. Foster, Joseph Fales, James Mahon, and William T. Shea. The motive of the negroes is unknown, and no warning or intimation of such a thing was given. Mr. Roby was first assaulted in the diggings and hit on the head with clubs until left for dead. He was found in a rock hole under a lot of boards. He was removed to the house, and took part in the battle with the blacks after having thirty stitches taken in his scalp. He is recovering. At noon the men congregated in front of the Superintendent's house and refused to work. When Mr. Jones, by direction of Assistant Superintendent Smith, attempted to arrest one of the ringleaders and take a pistol from him which had been taken from Mr. Roby, he was knocked down, and in a few seconds a howling mob surrounded him. He managed to get to the house where the other officers had sought shelter, through volleys of rocks and other missiles. The whites took refuge in the upper story of the superintendent's house and opened fire on the mob, which threw stones into the house from every direction and shot at any one in sight. The battle lasted three hours, with an occasional negro wounded, when the whites were startled by the explosion of a dynamite bomb which had been thrown on the lower porch. This was soon followed by another, until there was a continual roar of dynamite. The negroes were sheltered behind cars, trees, tanks and buildings. Shortly after 4 p.m. the negroes broke into the dynamite magazine and got a fresh supply of explosives. Knowing that the negroes intended to blow them into eternity the whites left the house and endeavored to reach the officers' quarters and make another stand, but they had not got twenty feet before the negroes attacked them with axes, knives, rocks, razors and clubs, uttering fiendish yells. each man was soon overtaken and disarmed. Foster was the first to drop his weapon, a small rifle. He was at once butchered. Fales was with an axe after he had surrendered his weapon. Shea when last seen was within a few feet of the cliffs with a number of negroes in pursuit, one of whom was firing at him with a revolver. His body has not been found. Some friendly negroes hid the surviving whites in a little building until the excitement had somewhat subsided, and while they were engaged in looting, robbing and pillaging the buildings. About 6 p.m. some negroes went to the building where the officers were hiding and told them to go up to the mess house and get supper, and they would not be harmed. They had not proceeded thirty feet before one of the devils, known as George Skey, placed a revolver within a few inches of Mahon's face and fired and then shot him through the heart. The brig Amoretti was in the harbor, but on account of the gale she could not be communicated with until Sunday evening. Mr. Smith wrote the captain a note requesting him to run over to Kingston, Jamaica, and ask the American Consul to send aid, but he had discharged nearly all his ballast and could not sail until Monday evening. On the 20th the British man-of-war Forward arrived, and was ordered to remain until relieved by the U.S. S. Galena. When last heard from the Galena was at Hayti. The Americans were taken on board the Forward and treated as guests. Among those injured on the island were Sam Merch, who was severely hurt by being struck with rocks on the head; Harry Jones, injured about the face with rocks and bruised about the body; H. N. Vail, shot accidentally through the leg.

TERRIBLE STEAMBOAT DISASTER.

A Mississippi Steamer's Boiler Explodes —Forty Persons Killed.

A New Orleans despatch of Thursday night says: The steamer Corona, of the Ouachita Consolidated Line, left here at 7 30 last evening for the Ouachita River, with a full cargo of freight and a good list of passengers. She exploded her boilers at False River, nearly opposite Port Hudson, at 11.45 this morning, causing the loss of the steamer and about forty lives. The Anchor Line steamer City of St. Louis, Captain James O'Neil, was near by, and her crew and boats saved many lives. The surviving passengers and crew were taken on board by Captain O'Neil and kindly cared for.

The following were lost, as far as known:

Crew—J. W. Blanks, captain; J. V. Jordan, first clerk; Charles C. F. Ellis, second clerk; Swimp Hanna, third clerk; Fred. Dinkle, barkeeper; Fred. Verman, barkeeper; Pat Ryan, steward; Dick Curtis, fireman; Tom Shook, engineer; Henry Doyle, porter; Jas. Swips, porter; Mr. Tate, barber; Henry Davis, deck hand; Tom Cook, sailorman; Billy Young, second mate; Sam Steel, Texas boy, also both captains of the deck watch and eight rousters.

Passengers—Dr. Atwell, corn doctor, and four negro musicians; Mr. Scott, Smithland, La.; Mr. Davis, stock man, Texas; Mr. Koenich; Mrs. Huff, of Opelousas; Mrs. Kauffman's nurse and eldest child.

About twenty of the crew and about fifteen passengers were saved. The Corona was on her first trip of the season, and had but recently come out of the dry dock, where she received repairs amounting to nearly $12,000. She was built at Wheeling, W.Va., several years ago, and had a carrying capacity of 2,700 bales of cotton. She was valued at $20,000.

Refused a Sight of Her Child.

A Detroit despatch says: Ellen Lavina Price is dying in a house at the corner of Twelfth street and Hancock avenue. On Tuesday James A. Randall began habeas corpus proceedings to compel Mr. Price to allow her to see their 4-year-old child. The husband escaped the writ by going to Toronto and taking the child.

EUROPEAN UNEASINESS.

How the Game of Statecraft is Played by Continental Powers.

A St. Petersburg despatch says: There has been no important increase recently in the effective force of the Russian army, nor have any measures been taken to meet an outbreak of hosilities. The resources of the Government are already sufficiently strong to provide for the country's security. Far from warlike enterprise being contemplated, the Germanophile party at court has renewed its endeavors to bring about a friendly understanding between Germany and Russia, and the hope is enterained that the Czar's coming meeting with Emperor William and Prince Bismarck will lead to a rapprochement between the two countries. The Russian National party, however, is trying to neutralize these facts through the dominant official influences, and is also making an enegetic campaign in the Slavophile newspapers.

A Berlin despatch says: An uneasy feeling seems to prevail in Austrian official circles, it being feared that the Chancellor is about to make a new move by offering to assist in restoring Russian dominance in Bulgaria, as an inducement to draw the Czar from a French alliance. Prince Bismarck is suspected of playing a double game. It is thought that on the one hand he will threaten the Czar with a movement looking to the firm establishment of Bulgarian independence, while on the other he will offer an entente based on a proposal that Russia shall have a freer hand to deal with Bulgaria and intervene in Armenia. It is certain that if the Czar received Prince Bismarck's proposals coldly, the recognition of Prince Ferdinand by the Porte, the powers forming the triple alliance, and England will be the immediate consequence. The Sultan has already agreed to recognize Prince Ferdinand, and only awaits the visit of Emperor William before issuing a formal proclamation to that effect. It is reported Emperor William will remain two weeks at the Turkish capital. He will be accompanied by Count Herbert Bismarck. The length of the Emperor's visit is attributed to an intention to inquire into the condition of the Turkish army and to test the statement of German officers that the Porte is still able to maintain a standing army of 400,000.

THE MORRISON TRIAL.

Warren's Revolver Produced—Was it Loaded or Not?

A Sherbrooke despatch of Thursday says: The twice postponed trial of Donald Morrison, the famed Megantic outlaw, for the murder of Lucius Warren in June, 1888, while the latter was trying to arrest him on a warrant alleging arson and criminal assault upon the property and person of one Alphonse DuQuette, who had bought the farm from which Morrison had been evicted for non-payment of mortgage, began this morning in the Criminal Court for St. Francois district, and promises to last several days. The case is a most complicated one, and attracts considerable attention from the fact that Morrison defied the whole Province for nearly a year and was only captured by a chance shot from the revolvers of a party of Montreal policemen who had been sent to arrest him.

The case for the Crown was opened by Mr. Belanger, who ridiculed the sensational stories about the case published by the papers, and told the jury to disabuse their minds of any prejudice they might have entertained. After the coroner and the medical examiner had given technical evidence about the inquest and autopsy, George W. Mayo described the shooting as he saw it, and Magistrate Morin, who issued the warrant on the arson case, detailed the circumstances surrounding its issue.

Donald Graham, of Megantic, the principal witness for the Crown, then gave a lucid statement regarding the murder, which was very damaging to the prisoner. Upon cross examination, however, he contradicted his former evidence and got considerably rattled, and this somewhat lessened the force of his testimony.

A peculiar incident occurred during the afternoon session. The Crown counsel made a motion that Warren's revolver, which was picked up at his side and was produced in Court, be taken out and unloaded. Both defence and Court heartily agreed to this, and it was so taken out. Hardly was it out when it was back again, the High Constable remarking that all the chambers were empty. A few moments before one of the witnesses had sworn that, when picked up the revolver was loaded, and, when the motion to remove it was made, the counsel for the Crown stated most distinctly that the revolver was in the same condition as when found. The High Constable's report, therefore, caused no small sensation.

A Sherbrooke despatch of Friday says: The Morrison trial is approaching an unexpectedly early close, counsel for the Crown having this afternoon, after the examination of fourteen witnesses, declared the case closed as far as they were concerned. To-morrow the case for the defence will be begun, and then, after the addresses of counsel and the Judge's charge, the case will be given to the jury.

From the evidence submitted by the Crown, a pretty strong case has been made out against the prisoner, but the great drawback on this side is the number of contradictions on important points which have been made by Crown witnesses. Those examined to-day were: Eustache Roy, George Roderique, Antoine Roy, Nelson H. Leet and Arthur W. Goff, of Boston. The chief incident of to-day's proceedings was the confession of Leet that he had come here prepared to testify for the defence as well as for the Crown. His examination by the Crown counsel was most severe, and at one time it was thought the Court would be requested to order his arrest for perjury.

There are ten witnesses for the defence, and all of them will be rigidly cross-examined by the Crown, so that the prospects for concluding to-morrow are not very bright. The opinion of those who have heard the evidence so far submitted is that the verdict will be either manslaughter or acquittal, certainly not murder. The defence will try to prove self-defence as the best means of getting their man off.

WOMEN DOCTORS.

Dr. McLaughlin on Women as Physicians.

At the opening of the Toronto Women's Medical College Thursday Dr. McLaughlin, a lady physician, delivered an interesting address. She appeared in academic robe and hood, and read her address on the subject, "Should women engage in the study and practice of medicine?" Dr. McLaughlin is a graduate of the Woman's Medical College and a valued and capable member of the teaching faculty, and for this reason, no doubt, her words were listened to with all the greater interest. In opening her address Dr. McLaughlin referred to the fact that women had become lawyers, artists, editors and even preachers of the Gospel, and asked if there was any good reason why they should not become doctors as well. The first objection usually raised was that women had not the capacity, but this she showed to be a wholly unfounded assumption by referring to known and admitted facts. She cited first the case of the Woman's Medical College in London, the graduates of which ranked high in the honor list of the University of London, there being among their number two gold medalists. Turning then to America, which she characterised as the land of liberty and progress, the land in which women's work and women's power to work was more fully recognized than elsewhere, she said that in this, as in other matters intellectual, Boston led, the first Medical College being established there in 1848. New York and Philadelphia and other places followed, and the graduates of these colleges had made for themselves reputation and even fame. It was said that women physicians were not wanted. But in some countries men physicians were not wanted, as in Oriental countries, where a male physician, having a woman for his patient, was not allowed even to see that patient, and was obliged to prescribe as best he could without seeing her. But in such cases women physicians would be allowed to see their patients. Considering the immense field thus awaiting the work of the woman physician, it was absurd to say that woman physicians were not needed. But even in our own country the need for female physicians was great. Modesty, the greatest virtue in women, sometimes stood between the sick woman and cure. There were many cases on record of women who had for years endured the most excruciating pain rather than consult a physician because that physician was a man. Women would confide to women what they would never confide to men. Why not then give to women the education necessary to enable her on receiving these confidences to cure the disease which made them necessary? Then there was the great world of childhood, which also had its manifold forms of disease. A woman can gain the confidence of a sick child as a man could not do, and if she had the knowledge and skill of a physician she could do more than a man to effect a cure. It was objected that the contact with disease and the study necessary to a physician's education made a woman callous and robbed her of the sympathy which was her chief charm. But was there any person who, in the common ways of life, had so often to deal with sickness, to administer the bitter draught or pill as the mother of a family? Did such experiences make the mother harsh or rob her of her sympathy for her own? Were there any who saw more of the horrors of war than the angels of mercy, the nurses in the hospital and the field? And yet were there any who manifested such keen and constant sympathy with the suffering? Could it be said that the study of nature would make women disregard or forget the God of Nature? Woman was naturally religious, and in this women had one qualification which would make them all the better physicians. The sympathy of woman for woman gave the female physician means of effecting cures in cases which a man could not understand. A man having a woman for a patient might conclude that the case was one of nervous strain caused by overwork of the brain. But a woman physician would probe deeper, and would find the cause of suffering to be some hidden sorrow or unhappiness, and by her sympathy would do much to effect a cure. The need for women to enter the medical field was great; the capacity of women to work in that field would not but be admitted, and the lecturer concluded that the work of educating and training women for this noble profession was one which must result in good.

Died in a Fit.

Thomas Chadwick, a man of about forty-six years of age, came here from Hamilton when the new shops were opened. He was a fitter by trade and when in Hamilton shops he was frequently taken with epileptic fits while at work, but when he came here the change seemed to do him good, and up to about a month ago he enjoyed comparatively good health and freedom from his old malady. During the past month he was taken bad again and laid off work. He was able to be about and yesterday, while crossing the Dominion hotel, just across from the depot, he was again taken with an epileptic attack. He was taken to his home, just a few doors away on Downie street, and a doctor sent for, but before the medical man arrived he was dead.—Stratford Herald.

A REDHEADED DEADHEAD.

A Bonnie Scotch Lass Travels Abroad to Escape a Whipping.

Little Maggie Stewart, now in the care of Agent Stocking, of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, is in her own way as much of a record breaker as the City of New York, in which she came to this country about two weeks ago, says the New York Times. Maggie's specialty is deadhead travelling. She came from Ellenburgh, Scotland, by way of Greenock, Belfast, Fleetwood, Manchester, the Isle of Man and Liverpool, without paying a a cent of fare, and was supported all the way by well-to-do people whom she amused. Maggie is nearly 15 years old. She is short and stockily built, with red hair and a face unrelieved by prominent features. In Ellenburg the girl has a father and mother, two brothers and one sister. The family were poor, and Maggie's services were let out to a woman named Proctor, who did a retail milk business. Maggie was one of the carriers. One day she fell and broke her pitcher. Mrs. Procter threatened to tell her father, who was sure to whip the girl. The latter started for home, but decided on the way to take French leave of her family. She got on board a train for Glasgow, escaped the guard's notice, and when she got to the city took another train for Greenock. Other passengers shared their lunches with the little girl. Nobody had the heart to put her off. So she drifted to Belfast and then to Manchester. Without any idea where she was going, she boarded another train, which left her at Fleetwood. There she took a sailing vessel for the Isle of Man, but at once came back to Liverpool on another. Wandering about the docks, hungry and a bit despondent, little Miss Stewart saw a steam tug, which seemed about to pull out into the dark waters of the Mersey. There were several families abroad with little children. Maggie is fond of children. She went, too. Each of the other passengers thought she was a nurse girl employed by some one else. The tug reached the City of New York, which was about to start for America. The passengers were hurriedly shifted to the steamship. Maggie was among them. She played with the infants, made herself generally agreeable, and ended by following a lady into the second cabin. She was taken care of. Arriving in New York she wandered to the residence on Park avenue of the lady who had protected her on the way over. There she was kept for 10 days and then turned over to Agent Stocking. He says the pauper immigration law will hardly apply to a second cabin passenger, and, as he thinks Maggie is not bad, but only restless, he will try to find a home for her on this side of the water. He has heard from her father, who is not at all anxious to have the girl come back. She will be kept for a few days at the society's rooms in West 23rd street.

Drinking More Whiskey.

The Quebec W. C. T. U. annual convention is in session at Montreal, and at it the following statement was made: "That during the year 1888 5,514,509 gallons of spirituous liquors were manufactured in Canada." This is an increase of more than one million gallons over the production of 1886, and represents one gallon for each man, woman and child in the Dominion.

an extensive business in the manufacture of paper clothing, and the fabric is said to equal that of any other class of goods in style and durability. For blankets, piano coverings and similar purposes, the paper fabrics are an established success. They are light and serviceable. Dr. George Thenius, of Vienna, has invented a process for the manufacture of leather from red beechwood. The best wood for the purpose is taken from 50 or 60-year-old trees, cut in the spring, which must be worked up immediately, bark peeled off, steamed, treated with chemicals in a kettle under pressure, and exposed to several more operations, which the inventor does not mention, as he wants to have them patented. From the prepared wood strong and thin pieces are made by means of heavy pressure. The inventor states that a solid sole leather can be obtained, which he claims is superior to animal leather in firmness and durability, and can be worked up in the same way as animal leather, nailed and sewed.

HE TURNED THE TABLES.

How a Clever Englishman Obtained a Seat in a Crowded Railway Carriage.

"Will you kindly allow me to stand?" asked a gentleman, as he got into a railway carriage, which carriage already contained the specified number, says the London Court Journal.

"Certainly not, sir!" exclaimed a passenger occupying a corner seat near the door. "The way these trains are overcrowded is shameful!"

"As you appear to be the only person who objects to my presence," replied the gentleman, "I shall remain where I am."

"Then I shall call the guard and have you removed, sir."

Suiting the action to the word, the aggrieved passenger rose and, putting his head out of the window, vociferously summoned the guard. The new comer saw his opportunity and quietly slipped into the corner seat.

"What's up?" inquired the guard as he opened the carriage door.

"One over the number," replied the new comer, coolly.

"You must come out, sir; the train's going on." And without waiting for further explanation the guard pulled out the aggrieved passenger, who was left wildly gesticulating on the platform.

The Run-to-Everything Family.

(By Knoxonian.)

The Run-to-Everything family may be found in nearly every village and small town in Ontario, but they are found in the largest numbers in places populated by the third or fourth generation of Canadians.

Negatively considered, the Run-to-Everything family are noted for not liking their home. Like Sam Jones, they hate a quiet time. It kills the members of this family to stay long on one spot, especially if that spot is around home. They cannot read. Thinking is an exercise never known in the family. They have nothing to think with. Their conversation consists of a few common-places about the last thing they were at, or the next place they are going to.

Positively considered, the principal characteristic of the Run-to-Everything family is that they run to something every evening and often during the day. You may always count on seeing them at everything that is free. The Salvation Army supplied a long-felt want to these people. Now they can go to the barracks every night when there is nothing else to go to. Heretofore they were not sure of a place of resort for every evening except when special services were going on in some of the churches.

Old Mr. Run-to-Everything is not a bad old man in the sense of being vicious. In fact he has not energy enough, or brains enough, to do anything brilliant for the devil. His strong points are loafing in public places and talking to little knots of people about affairs. He is always found in Court, especially the Police Court. He attends council meetings, and meetings of all kinds regularly. Next day his chief employment consists in addressing other citizens on the points discussed at last night's meeting. Nothing pleases him so much as to gather a little crowd around him and have a discussion about affairs of State. The old man has always had a weakness for taking care of the Empire. Indeed he has been known to devote his whole time to public affairs when his wife was unable to leave her room and the children had the measles. So devoted a public servant is old Mr. Run-to-Everything that he would go to a political meeting or an indignation meeting on the Jesuit question wife were seriously ill and there was ite to eat in the house or a stick to the stove. Such devotion to public eserves a sound—kicking.

od woman made two serious mis-and these mistakes were made at points. The first was in marrying man, and the second in allowing her to contract the habit of running to ing when they were young. Of t would not be easy for her to keep dren at home when their father set example before them, but she did
. Like many another mistaken
, she thought that the only way for ldren to enjoy theselves was to go ace. The possibility of having a e at home never occurred to her.
ldren grew up to think that they house in which they rested be-ns.

Run-to-Everything, the eldest son,
a bad kind of a fellow in his way.
oyhood the village was small and as almost nothing to run to, and he contract the habit so badly as the members of the family. With a ining, Bill might have become a oung man, but it is impossible for g useful to grow up in a Run-to-hing family. The younger boys their time by running from school and to everything that came along, from
Barnum's circus down to the last dog fight.
Shows of all kinds, matches of all kinds, races of all kinds. Crowds of all kinds were always and everywhere patronized by the boys of this family. The boys soon became about as useless as their father.

The girls of the Run-to-Everything family were the most useless of all. Their mother thought they could enjoy themselves only when they were going some place, and, mother-like, she worked herself half to death to let them go some place. The result was that they knew nothing and could do nothing. Their characteristics were small talk, an inane giggle, and a weakness in the upper story that would make it rather dangerous for them to come into the vicinity of an idiot asylum anywhere near the time that a female patient had escaped. One of the worst things about the habit of running to everything is that it makes a family cheap, and cheapness hurts a family as much as anything on this side of downright wickedness. A young man who rates himself cheap need never be surprised if his employer rates him in the same way. A young woman who rates herself cheap need not wonder if her neighbors take her at her own valuation, or perhaps a trifle lower. There is nothing, we repeat, on this side of immorality that will cheapen a family or an individual faster than running to every kind of a meeting, every kind of an entertainment, every kind of a show that can be got up in a country village.

Far be it from us to say that anybody should shut himself up and live the life of a hermit. That is the other extreme. Between running to everything and going to nothing there is a golden mean, as there always is between extremes. At this season of the year judicious families will, as far as practicable, arrange for giving a certain number of evenings each week to church duties, a certain number to social duties, and as many as possible to home pleasures and mental improvement. Public men will find any arrangement very difficult, but the effort, yes, even the desire, to make such an arrangement will do them good. A course of reading for the winter should be included in every plan. More anon.—Canada Presbyterian.

A TERRIBLE TRAGEDY.

Murder and Suicide in a Public Garden in Scotland.

On the morning of the 20th ult. Mr. George Todd, marine inspector, visited Caddiehill Gardens, there, to look after his plot. While there he looked into the summer house and was horrified to see the dead bodies of a man and a woman. An alarm was at once given, and the police appeared on the scene, when the body of the man was fully identified as that of Andrew S. Walker, son of Mr. Walker, coal merchant, and the female was recognized as Miss Holmes, a young woman who resided with her father, John Holmes, joiner, on Mearns street. The pair, who were regarded as sweethearts, were seen entering the gardens on the previous evening, and the tragedy had been enacted soon after, as when found the bodies had the appearance of having been dead for several hours. The girl was found lying on her back on a seat in the summer house with a bullet mark through the left side of her head. Walker was on his knees, dead, on the floor, with his left arm lying upon the seat and his right hand resting upon her breast. In his right hand was a six-chambered revolver, two of the chambers being empty. He had shot himself in the mouth the bullet passing out through the back of the head. There appeared to have been no struggle, and from the position of the bodies it was evident that Miss Holmes had been first shot and afterwards laid upon the seat, with something in the shape of a pillow below her head. On committing the awful deed, which was probably done immediately outside the summer-house, and after laying her on the seat, Walker would seem to have gone outside and gathered some flowers and then neatly arranged them over her breast. This must have occupied some little time, and when that is considered it is evident that the deed had been premeditated. Be this as it may, Walker, as stated above, dropped on his knees beside the lifeless body of his sweetheart and shot himself in the mouth with the revolver. Both of the young people were Sabbath School teachers, and were much beloved by all who knew them. What led to the tragedy cannot be even guessed at in Greenock.

The young man will take a scientific course at Lehigh University, and will afterwards take his degree of civil engineer at the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute of Troy, New York.

A curious scene was witnessed in Palace yard, Westminster, England. A sparrow was picking up the corn which had fallen from the horses' nosebags, when a mouse appeared and proceeded to dispute with the sparrow his right to the dainty morsels. A fight ensued, which lasted for some minutes, and then the sparrow beat a retreat. The sparrow had evidently been injured in the tussle, and for a time was unable to fly. At last the sparrow flew up, and a cabman finished the incident by killing the mouse with a whip.—Exchange.

HAVING A LITTLE TIME.

A Broker's Hunt by Match-Light for Scraps of $10,000.

One evening last week a popular young stock broker started out to have a little time with "the boys." He had it. It was about 2 a.m. when he began to think that he had reached the limit, and he summoned a cab and gave the driver the number of his residence. On his way home he searched his pockets for contraband matter. By the flickering light of the gas lamps he passed he gathered in his lap a pile of crumpled paper, and this he tore into bits and scattered along the roadway. When he reached home he paid the cabby and repaired to his room, where he proceeded to disrobe. It is always his habit to lay his money and valuables on the dresser when he retires, and when the children come in before he arises in the morning they are permitted to appropriate every coin of a value less than $1. As he laid his money out on this occasion he happened to think of a cheque for $10,000 which he had been paid for margins by a certain firm after banking hours the previous day. He searched his pockets and could not find a trace of it. Then he happened to think of the documents he had torn up in a maudlin way in the cab. It did not take him long to draw a conclusion. Hastily donning his clothes he filled his pockets with matches and traversed the route of the cab. After an hour's search he succeeded in picking up nineteen bits of the destroyed cheque. These bits, on being pasted together, formed the valuable whole. Early in the morning he was down town. He sent the mosaic cheque back to the house which issued it, along with a story to the effect that it had been accidentally torn up. He requested a duplicate. This was issued at once, and before banking hours he had a duplicate cheque ready for use.—Chicago Herald.

Value of Advertisements.

"Do I believe in advertising?" said a prominent lawyer, a day or two ago. "Well, rather; and in the hidden advertisement more than in any other. I remember, one day, reading a very interesting story that ended in what I took to to be a puff for Dr. Pierce's Purgative Pellets. I threw down the paper in a rage. Not a week after that I needed some medicine of that kind, and went and bought those same little pills." "Did I find them good?" "Why yes, the best thing of the kind I ever saw, but that has nothing to do with the first question, and I only mention the joke on myself to show that advertising does pay."

The Romance of Reality.

Bessie—Madge was out walking with Charlie and they had a quarrel. Charlie gave her a shove and she fell into the lake. Everybody said she would have been drowned if George hadn't been there and saved her. She is going to be married next week.

Jennie—To George?

Bessie—No; to Charlie.

At first a little, hacking cough,
"'Tis nothing but a cold,"
They say, "'Twill very soon wear off."
Alas, the story old!
The hectic cheek, the failing strength,
The grief that cannot save,
And life's wan flame goes out, at length,
In a consumptive's grave.

If persons would use Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, when irritation of the lungs is indicated by a cough, it would be an easy matter to avert consumption. Be wise in time. The "Discovery" is guaranteed to cure in all cases of diseases for which it is recommended, or money paid for it will be promptly refunded.

Donald Morrison, the Megantic outlaw, received a wholesome dose last Friday, when he was sentenced to eighteen years in the penitentiary for manslaughter.

Remains of victims are still being unearthed in the vicinity of Johnstown, Pa. The world at large has scarcely, even yet, grasped the magnitude of that terrible catastrophe, the terrors of which have never been equalled on this continent.

Thornbury intends to have electric light. Meaford has had it for some time and now looks down upon its sister town from a brilliant height with a kind of dynamore expression which the latter does not enjoy. Therefore Thornbury will electrify itself, too, and try to keep up her end of the procession.

An ingenious Frenchman has invented a process of manufacturing silk from chemicals. He analyzed silk as produced by the ordinary silk worm, and invented a process whereby he can produce even a superior article to the old, and at about one-third the cost of the old systen. The new process was shown at the Paris exhibition during the past summer and attracted much attention.

With every great invention new dangers to humanity arise. When Watt harnessed the monster steam he brought into existence an agency which has cost thousands upon thousands of human lives, and yet who is there that will say it was not worth the sacrifice? When Benjamin Franklin drew down from space the electric fluid that act disclosed a volatile power more potent than the sword of Damocles, and one which is not as yet fully developed. Deaths and fires from electric causes are becoming alarmingly frequent. Dr. Talmage's tabernacle in Brooklyn was destroyed by fire on Saturday night, supposedly by lightning attracted to the edifice by a new electric plant which was being placed therein. Thus in all good there is some evil. Even Edison himself is not an unadulterated benefactor of mankind.

American justice is at present having a hard row to hoe in Chicago. For some weeks now the court has been endeavoring to empanel a jury to try the Cronin suspects and have failed as yet. They are still at the starting point. Several had been accepted, but before the requisite number was secured the enemies of justice had been working energetically to bribe the men who were chosen. This scheme was exposed by one who was approached, and it has caused a sensation in Chicago nearly equal to that of the Haymarket murders of two years ago. Prominent officials are implicated, including two bailiffs. Chicago must awaken from her dozing, or her heterogenous mass of humanity will some day bathe her in blood. She has had the baptism of fire—possibly when she receives the baptism of blood her "phoenix-like" proclivities will again assert themselves as they did after that 9th of October, 1871, when the QueenCity of the West was laid low in ashes; but we fear it will not be until then if her corruptness be not speedily and thoroughly expurged.

OUR TABLE.

For fruit growers and florists we know of no publication which can equal the Canadian Horticulturist. Its suggestions and the experimental results which it publishes are extremely valuable. Published at Grimsby. One dollar per annum.

The Farmers' Advocate is something which no farmer should be without. It is a grand paper, and the only genuine farm paper published in Canada. Mr. Weld has just begun the publication of a second edition for Manitoba and the Northwest. We are pleased to see this evidence of prosperity in the old Farmer's Advocate. One dollar per annum. Address Wm. Weld, London, Ont.

THE CANADIAN QUEEN.—This new and elegant magazine is sure to please every Canadian woman. It is devoted to fashion, art, fancy work, flowers, toilet, home decoration and household matters. It is handsomely illustrated, and is equal to any of the high-priced English and American publications. It should be in every cultivated home. To introduce it the publishers offer to send it three months on trial for only 25c. Address The Canadian Queen, Toronto, Ont.

The modern magazine may be taken as embodying the best literature of the world, as the magazine editor pays the highest prices to novelists, scientists, statesmen, soldiers, and even kings and princes, for the best they can furnish in the literary line. The well-edited magazine becomes an educating influence in the family circle, whose importance cannot be over-estimated. The children as they grow up, are attracted by its illustrations, and so come in time to have a taste for reading. There is always something that is new, something that is strange, something that is interesting; and we consider that we are doing our readers a positive benefit if we are instrumental in placing such a publication within their reach. The special arrangement which we have made with the Cosmopolitan presents very unusual inducements. That magazine, although only in the tenth mounth under its new arrangement, is already recognized as one of the most interesting publications of the day. It is seeking subscribers everywhere and obtaining them. The proprietors believe that the Cosmopolitan has only to be examined to secure a permanent subscriber. That is why we are enabled to make, if the offer is accepted before January next, such a very low rate, by which our readers can obtain the Cosmopolitan for little more than the cost of this journal alone. Just think of what the combinations means! You obtain your home journal at about the regular price, and have thrown in a magazine which gives you, in a year, nearly fourteen hundred pages of reading matter by the ablest writers in the world, including six hundred pages of illustrations that are unsurpassed in point of interest and execution. Will it not pay you to send a subscription to this office for the Advance and the Cosmopolitan, immediately? Remember, only $2.40 for the two—the price of the magazine alone.

South Grey Teachers' Institute.

By our own Reporter.

The twenty-fourth convention of the inspectoral division of South Grey was held in the Model School, Durham, on the 3rd and 4th inst. Owing to the unfavorable condition of the weather, however, only a small number was present at the time appointed for opening so that the work was not begun until 2 p.m., when ex-president Ramage was called to the chair in the absence of Mr. Glendinning. The meeting being opened in the usual way, the minutes of the May meeting were read and adopted.

Mr. Campbell was called upon to report the action of the county council in regard to promotion examination papers. He expressed great pleasure in the generous manner in which the council acted in the matter of assuming the expense of printing, etc. Discussion followed as to the best time for holding these promotion examinations, many contending for June and December while others thought better to hold them about the latter part of March and October. A vote was taken which showed the Association to be equally divided, and it was unanimously agreed to leave the matter with the Inspector to arrange with the other inspectoral divisions.

Mr. Cowan made a very able and eloquent address on the teaching of temperance in schools. He did not believe that it was within the power of the teacher to inculcate temperance principles and that such work could never be accomplished by following the plan outlined in the authorised temperance text book. While a strong advocate of temperance he could not see the practicability of carrying out the work successfully, moreover, he did not see the justice of developing this one phase of our moral natures to the neglect of all others. The ministers were the proper persons to take up this subject, and a more vigorous effort might be made by them instead of urging the Education Department to place an additional burden on the teacher whose program was already overcrowded. Every teacher should have and has a right to fight against the imposition of additional work. While all admired the outspoken character of Mr. Cowan's address, many took exception to his views believing that the truly moral temperate teacher could do a great deal towards the developement of the moral nature of a child. Amongst those who took part in the discussion was Mr. Binnie, a trustee, whose brief address was full of forcible and fearless denunciation of all forms of intemperance, whether in eating, drinking or excess of any other sort. He believed that the future national prosperity of our country depended largely upon the indefatigable efforts of the teachers to subdue all kinds of vice. The plastic nature of the child's mind is such that, during school age, impressions for good or evil are easily made. How important is it then that children should live in an atmosphere of purity, surrounded by the very best influences that tend toward the developement of those moral qualities that go to make up the perfect man.

Mr. W. Houston, M. A., Parliamentary Librarian, Toronto, was the acting director of the Association, and occupied during the two days upwards of five hours in the developement of his methods in the practical, scientific and esthetic treatment of English, commencing with a child on his first entrance to the school. Mr. Houston traced the developement of the language faculty to that period when the cultured English scholar can see and appreciate the beauties of the masterpieces of our English literature and enter into sympathy with our great English authors. He denounced the ordinary rigid adherence to text books and inveighed against all forms of teaching, the object of which is to "stuff" pupils for the examinations, nor would he measure the ability of the teacher by the number of candidates he gets through an examination. He did not come to instruct teachers in the way to prepare pupils to pass the "entrance," but to give an exhibition of whathe considered good model teaching and advised all to endeavor to do good work for at least eight months in the year and if obliged to do any "stuffing" to do it all the last month. In his esthetic treatment of English he condemned the use of annotated editions of English authors, or using his own words, "If you would appreciate the force of human genius read Shakespeare; if you would appreciate the insignificance of human learning, read the commentators." It would take too much time and space to give even an outline of the subject as taken up by Mr. Houston, whom, to appreciate must be heard. Ordinarily this gentleman would not be regarded as an orator, but it must be admitted by all that he is brim full of his subject, has a masterly command of language, a pleasing and impressive way of expressing himself and a wonderful faculty of keeping the attention of his audience. He never gets excited and his mode of address is purely conversational.

In the evening a public meeting, presided over by Dr. Gun, was given in the Town Hall. Short but excellent addresses of welcome were given to the teachers by the chairman, Rev. Mr. McNair and the other resident clergymen. Excellent music was furnished by the band and several vocal selections were rendered in a very highly appreciated manner by the local talent of Durham. In addition to this we must not forget to mention the very creditable exhibition of club swinging by Master and Miss Sutherland. While the good people of Durham are wide-awake to the intellectual development of their children it must be admitted that they are also giving great attention to their physical and esthetic culture as well. The lecturer of the evening, however, was Mr. W. Houston on the topic "Reading for Recreation." As to the character of the reading recommended, that was left to the choice of the individual. Some, but he believed the number to be very small, read religious works for recreation, others, a comparatively small number also, preferred investigation of a scientific subject of some sort. History and biography might also be pursued with pleasure and profit. No objection could reasonably be offered to such a course of reading, providing the religious were orthodox, the scientific accurate, and the historical and the biographical works reliable. The majority, however, preferred novel reading. He had no objection to this either if the novel had a good moral, but a great many of the lower class novels of the present day unfit a person for any other kind of reading and cannot be recommended. Mr. Houston prefers to read the old novels and does not feel disposed to spend his time in investigating the merits of every new production. It is necessary to the proper understanding of history to read certain novels. For example, if you wish to get an insight into the manners and customs and social life of the people of England in the time of King John, you will not get it in the histories, but you can get it in "Ivanhoe." Other instances were cited but this will suffice.

Mr. Hagarty, the headmaster of Mt. Forest high school, was called upon and congratulated the teachers of South Grey on the success of their convention as well as the people of Durham for the interest they are taking in attending the teachers' meetings.

Friday forenoon Mr. Blakeston gave a lengthy address on school games with reasons why such games should be more generally introduced. Of the various games mentioned, Mr. B. thought foot ball to be the best adapted to the public school inasmuch as all could engage in the sport without much loss of time in choosing sides, etc.

Mr. Ramage read a very carefully prepared paper on the proceedings of the last meeting of the Ontario Teachers' Association held in August last at Niagara-on-the-lake. This gentlemen being so well known to the teachers of the inspectorate it would be unnecessary to say that the paper was interesting—paper as a rule appear dry but Mr. R's productions are an exception to the rule.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: Mr. Allen, president, Miss Sutherland first vice-president, Mr. W. K. Reid second vice-president, W. Irwin secretary treasurer. Committee of management, Misses Adams and Bull, and Messrs. Brown and Sharp.

Miss Leitch is visiting with her sister, Mrs. Will Moore, in Owen Sound.

Wanted—geese, turkys, ducks and chickens at M. Richardson & Co's.

Rev. Mr. McNeil, of Maxwell, exchanged pulpits with Rev. Mr. Emes on Sunday last.

R. Trimble, Esq., returned last week from Michigan, where he has been making an extended visit to relatives.

If you want a pair of good boots or rubbers or foot wear of any kind, try Wm. Clayton.

A good strong horse, healthy and in good condition. Cheap for cash or time to good paper. W. W. Trimble.

Mr. J.E. Moore, of Flesherton, will preach in the Orange hall, Eugenia, next Lord's Day at 3 o'clock, and in the school house, Kimberley, next Sabbath evening at 6.30.

Some new things in felt boots and rubbers worth seeing at M. Richardson & Co's.

Rev. Mr. Vansickle, of Wiarton, will preach in Flesherton Baptist Chapel next Lord's Day, morning 11 o'clock. He will also preach in Priceville in the afternoon at 2.30.

Keep your feet comfortable, dry and warm by buying your boots and shoes from Wm. Clayton.

The Queen's Valley is a beautiful picture these days. Clothed in its autumn Jacob's coat it presents a picture unsurpassed in beauty. It would repay one for driving ten miles to see it.

M. Richardson & Co. are buying all kinds of grain and dairy produce at top market prices.

You can have the Cosmopolitan magazine—one of the best magazines published—and The Advance for only $2.40. This applies to old and new subscribers and does not affect our gift enterprise.

We have neglected noticing that Mr. J.G. Russell and W. Armstrong have imported a handsome pleasure boat and will place it on Flesher's pond next summer. The girls are now longing for spring.

It will pay you to get your fall and winter boots, splendid stock, well made, prices right, at W. Clayton's.

The young people of Fountain Council, R.T. of T., are busily engaged preparing the drama, Ten Nights in a barroom, which they purpose giving to a Flesherton audience in the course of a few weeks, with the laudable object of purchasing an organ for their hall.

The new overcoats shown at M. Richardson & Co's., are superior in style, finish and material; any one intending to purchase should see their stock.

The season for shooting deer came in on Tuesday. Squire Stewart and Mr. Bishop, of Kimberley, left on Monday for the rocky wastes of Muskoka to while away a couple of weeks hunting the wah-aw-be-wawashkosh—or in plain English the antlered buck.

Three car loads of eggs have been shipped from this station this season, and Mr. Runstedler informs us that he will have five more. Apleap and plums are not very frequent around here but we can hold our own on the pure albuminous hardshell varieties of fruit.

Rev. Mr. Watson left for Ottawa on Tuesday to attend the Baptist home and foreign missionary convention which met in that city this week. Rev. Mr. Vansickle, of Wiarton, will fill Mr. Watson's pulpit here and and in Price vill on Sabbath next, and Mr. J.E. Moore will preach at Eugenia and Kimberley.

Felt boots, felt stockings, rubbers, overshoes, boots and shoes, selling cheap and good at Wm. Clayton's.

Geo. Smith, Flesherton, left for his home last week after spending the summer months with his uncle, John Smith, 3rd Line, Albion. He will be much missed in the Centerville Church as he always took an active part in everything which had for its object the welfare of church work. May success follow him is the wish of all who knew him.—[Bolton Enterprise.

A Nova Scotian's Opinion.

Robert C. Woodman, N.S., writes as follows:—Enclosed find $1 for another large bottle of Nasal Balm, which you will please send me by first mail. The bottle I sent for some time ago benefitted me very much more than any other preparation I ever tried.

Plowing Match,

The annual plowing match of Artemesia Agricultural society, also open to the townships of Glenelg, Proton and Egremont, will be held to-morrow (Friday) on the farm of Mr. Richard Whittaker, lot 7 on the 4th concession of Artemesia. See bills.

One carload safety coal oil, one carload dairy salt, pt. carload building hardware and crockery, cases boots and shoes, cases dry goods, cases millinery, bales of new goods opening every day at M. Richardson & Co's.

Good Business.

Mr. E. Vanzant has been very busy of late tearing down where others have builded. Last week he erected a monument for Mr. Geo. Patterson, Collingwood township, in memory of Mr. Patterson's daughter, in order to place which he took down a monument erected some time ago by Harrison, of Owen Sound, and which had proven unsatisfactory to Mr. Patterson. This makes two Owen Sound monuments which our Mr. Vanzant has replaced in Collingwood township. He is the popular marble man in that borough.

A Change.

There will be a small change in the staff of our public school at the end of of the present year, Miss Ganton having decided to leave. We understand that the trustees have, or are about to, secure the services of Miss Lizzie Richardson to fill Miss Ganton's position. Miss Richardson will, undoubtedly, make a first class teacher, and we congratulate the trustee upon securing so competent a person to take charge of the position which Miss Ganton has ably filled for three years past.

First Love.

How does a woman love? Once, no more,
Though life forever its loss deplore;
Deep in sorrow or deep in sin,
One king reigneth her heart within.
One alone, by night and day,
Moves her spirit to curse or pray,
One voice only can call her soul
Back from the grasp of death's control;
Though lovers beset her, or friends deride,
Yea, when she smileth another man's bride,
Still for her master her life makes moan—
Once is forever, and once alone.

How does a man love? Once, for all.
The sweetest voices of life may call,
Sorrow daunt him, or death dismay,
Joy's red roses bedeck his way;
Fortune smile, or jest or frown,
The cruel thumb of the world turn down;
Lust betray him, or love delight,
Through storm or sunshine, by day or night,
Yearning, toiling, asleep, awake,
Though souls may madden, or weak hearts break,
Better than wife, or child, or pelf,
Once and forever, he loves—himself.

The Vagaries of Electricity.

The story of the Newfoundland dog belonging to Charles Tupper, a restaurant proprietor of New York, is one that will startle a great many persons who are studying the mysterious forces and powers of the electrical current, which human ingenuity has so far only partially harnessed and controlled, but scarcely yet understands. The dog ran against a dangling "live" wire of an electrical illuminating company. A Western Union telegraph lineman had only a moment before picked up the wire and been knocked down by a shock of electricity passing through it. The dog fell on the wire and lay there motionless. With due precaution the body was presently pulled off and every effort was made to resuscitate the animal, which was a great pet. A veterinary surgeon was called in, who pronounced the dog dead. Two or three hours afterward an electrical expert suggested making a pit in the earth and placing the dog's body in it, to see if the forces of nature might not carry away the electricity from the body. The plan was tried. All night and all the next day the supposed corpse was motionless, but on the second day there were signs of life, and on the fourth the animal revived and struggled to his feet a live dog once more, weak and stiff, but very much better than a dead dog. It has since been carefully nursed, and now shows no signs of the disaster. The dog is two and a half years old and weighs sixty-eight pounds. The incident may well suggest enquiry whether persons receiving electrical shocks have not been buried before they were really dead, and it is sufficient to raise serious doubts whether the death punishment of murderers by electrical shocks is sufficient.

Divorces in France.

The divorce law passed in France in 1884 seems to be operating with terrible effect. In 1884 there were 3,657 divorces; in 1885, 4,123; in 1886, 4 007; in 1887, 5,797. But, the most astounding statement made is that in the department of the Seine—i. e., Paris and its neighborhood—there are no fewer than 627 divorces to every thousand marriages, or that considerably more than one in twenty marriages (say one in sixteen) ends in a divorce. On the other hand, in the Finistere and Cotes du Nord not much more than one in a thousand marriages ends in a divorce—a curious testimony this to the different morale of Parisian and Provincial life in France.—The Spectator.

Is This Logic?

A Rhode Island gentleman who helped repeal the prohibitory law by voting "approved," recently urged a W. C. T. U. lady to sign a remonstrance against a saloon being placed near her home. He was silenced by this clear headed response: "No! the State has pronounced the traffic legal and I have no right to interfere. If the saloon is to be opened at all, it is much better to have it here on a respectable street where the parents can guard their children, than to have it put among the poor and degraded, who have not the strength to resist its allurements."

Danish Drunkards.

Another method has been adopted by the Danish police with a view to putting an end to drunkenness. Every time a man is found in a state of intoxication in the streets or in a public place, he is, at the instance of the police, put in a carriage and taken home. In case a man is not able to give information as to his residence he is kept at the police station until sober. Then the publican who is convicted of supplying such a man with his last glass of drink is charged with the expenses of transport, which are sometimes very considerable.

He Was Thankful.

Mrs. Homespun—I'll tell you where you can find a job sawing five cords of wood, poor man.

Tramp (eagerly)—Where, mum?

"Just around the corner of the next street."

"Thank ye, mum; much obliged. I might have run right into it if it hadn't been for you."

A Choice of Veins.

Papa—Which of your suitors do you think you will accept, Maria, Jones or Smith?

Maria—Which would you favor, papa?

"Well, Smith has a fine vein of humor."

"But Jones has a fine vein of anthracite coal upon his farm, papa. I think I'll take him."

Sensible girl!

Not to be Fooled.

Mr. Limpley (whose wife has put in her annual application for a sealskin)—I am told that sealskin sacques will not be stylish this winter.

Mrs. Limpley (sagaciously)—Well, dear, I never did care much for style anyway.

An old tradesman in Scotland used to keep his accounts in a singular manner. He hung up two boots, one on each side of the chimney, and in one he put all the money he received, and in the other all the receipts and vouchers for the money he paid. At the end of the year, or whenever he wanted to make up his accounts, he emptied the boots, and by counting their several and respective contents he was enabled with a little trouble to make a balance, which was doubtless as satisfactory to himself as if it had been done by "double entry."—Irish Leather Trades Journal.

AN AMERICAN GIRL.

A coach from the Blue Lion had been ordered to present itself at a quarter past 5, promptly, and at the time specified it rattled up to the door with much spirit—with so much spirit, indeed, that Miss Belinda was a little alarmed.

"Dear, dear!" she said. "I hope the driver will be able to control the horse, and will not allow him to go too fast. One hears of such terrible accidents."

Then Mary Anne was sent to announce the arrival of the equipage to Miss Octavia, and, having performed the errand, came back, beaming with smiles.

"Oh, mum," she exclaimed, "you never see nothin' like her! Her gownd is 'evingly. An' lor'! how you do look yourself, to be sure."

Indeed, the lace ruffles on her "best" black silk, and the little cap on her smooth hair, had done a great deal for Miss Bassett, and she had only just been reproaching herself for her vanity in recognizing this fact. But Mary Anne's words awakened a new train of thought.

"Is—is Miss Octavia's dress a showy one, Mary Anne?" she inquired. "Dear me, I do hope it is not a showy dress!"

"I never see nothin' no eleganter, mum," said Mary Anne. "She wants nothin' but a veil to make a bride out of her—an' a becomminer thing she never has wore."

They heard the soft sweep of skirts at that moment, and Octavia came in.

"There!" she said, stopping when she had reached the middle of the room. "Is that simple enough?"

Miss Belinda could only look at her helplessly. The "white muslin" was composed almost entirely of Valenciennes lace; the blue ribbons were embroidered with field daisies; the air of delicate elaborateness about the whole was something which her innocent mind could not have believed possible in orthodox white and blue.

"I don't think I should call it exactly simple," she said. "My love, what a quantity of lace!"

Octavia glanced down at her jabots and frills complacently.

"There is a good deal of it," she remarked; "but then it is nice, and one can stand a good deal of nice Valenciennes on white. They said Worth made the dress. I hope he did. It cost enough. The ribbon was embroidered by hand, I suppose. And there is plenty of it cut up into these bows."

There was no more to be said. Miss Belinda led the way to the coach, which they entered under the admiring or critical eyes of several most respectable families, who had been lying in wait behind their window curtains since they had been summoned there by the sound of wheels.

As the vehicle rattled past the boarding-school, all the young ladies in the first class rushed to the window. They were rewarded for their zeal by a glimpse of a cloud of muslin and lace, a charmingly dressed yellow-brown head, and a pretty face, whose eyes favored them with a frank stare of interest.

"She had diamonds in her ears!" cried Miss Phipps, wildly excited. "I saw them flash. Ah, how I should like to see her without wraps! I have no doubt she is a perfect blaze!"

CHAPTER X.

ANNOUNCING MR. BAROLD.

Lady Theobald's invited guests sat in the faded blue drawing-room, waiting. Everybody had been unusually prompt, perhaps because everybody wished to be on the ground in time to see Miss Octavia Bassett make her entrance.

"I should think it would be rather a trial, even to such a girl as she is said to be," remarked one matron.

"It is but natural that she should feel that Lady Theobald will regard her rather critically, and that she should know that American manners will hardly be the thing for a genteel and conservative English country town."

"We saw her a few days ago," said Lucia, who chanced to hear this speech, "and she is very pretty. I think I never saw any one so very pretty before."

"But in quite a threatrical way, I think, my dear," the matron replied, in a tone of gentle correction.

"I have seen so very few theatrical people," Lucia answered, sweetly, "that I scarcely know what the theatrical way is, dear Mrs. Burnham. Her dress was very beautiful, and not like what we wear in Slowbridge; but she seemed to me to be very bright and pretty, in a way quite new to me, and so just a little odd."

"I have heard that her dress is most extravagant and wasteful," put in Miss Pilcher, whose educational position entitled her to the condescending respect of her patroness. "She has lace on her morning gowns which——"

"Miss Bassett and Miss Octavia Bassett," announced Dobson, throwing open the door."

Lady Theobald rose from her seat. A slight rustle made itself heard through the company, as the ladies all turned toward the entrance, and after they had so turned, there were evidences of a positive thrill. Before the eyes of all, Belinda Bassett advanced with rich ruffles of Mechlin at her neck and wrists, with a delicate and distinctly novel cap upon her head, her niece following her with an unabashed face, twenty pounds' worth of lace on her dress, and unmistakable diamonds in her little ears.

"There is not a shadow of timidity about her!" cried Mrs. Burnham, under breath. "This is actual boldness!"

But this was a very severe term to use, notwithstanding that it was born of righteous indignation. It was not boldness at all. It was only the serenity of a young person who was quite unconscious that there was anything to fear in the rather unimposing party before her. Octavia was accustomed to entering rooms full of strangers. She had spent several years of her life in hotels, where she had been stared out of countenance by a few score new people every day. She was even used to being in some sort a young person of note. It was nothing unusual for her to know that she was being pointed out. "That pretty blonde," she often heard it said, "is Martin Bassett's daughter. Sharp fellow, Bassett—and lucky fellow, too. More money than he can count."

So she was not at all frightened when she walked in behind Miss Belinda. She glanced about her cheerfully, and catching sight of Lucia, smiled at her as she advanced up the room. The call of state Lady Theobald had made with her granddaughter had been a very brief one, but Octavia had taken a decided fancy to Lucia, and was glad to see her again.

"I am glad to see you, Belinda," said her ladyship, shaking hands. "And you also, Miss Octavia."

"Thank you," responded Octavia.

"You are very kind," Miss Belinda murmured gratefully.

"I hope you are both well?" said Lady Theobald, with majestic condescension, and in tones to be heard all over the room.

"Quite well, thank you," murmured Miss Belinda again. "Very well indeed.' Rather as if this fortunate state of affairs was the result of her ladyship's kind intervention with the fates.

She felt terribly conscious of being the centre of observation, and rather overpowered by the novelty of her attire, which was plainly creating a sensation, Octavia, however, who was far more looked at, was entirely oblivious of the painful prominence of her position. She remained standing in the middle of the room, talking to Lucia, who had approached to greet her. She was so much taller than Lucia that she looked very tall indeed by contrast, and also very wonderfully dressed. Lucia's white muslin was one of Miss Chickie's fifteen, and was, in a "genteel" way, very suggestive of Slowbridge. Suspended from Octavia's waist, by a long loop of the embroidered ribbon, was a little round fan of downy, pale blue feathers, and with this she played as she talked; but Lucia, having nothing to play with, could only stand with her little hands hanging at her sides.

"I have never been to an afternoon tea like this before," Octavia said. "It is nothing like a kettledrum."

"I am not sure that I know what a kettledrum is," Lucia answered. "They have them in London, I think; but I have never been to London."

"They have them in New York," said Octavia, "and they are a crowded sort of afternoon parties, where ladies go in carriage-toilet, not evening dress. People are rushing in and out all the time."

Lucia glanced around the room, and smiled.

"That is very unlike this," she remarked.

"Well," said Octavia, "I should think that, after all, this might be nicer."

Which was very civil.

Lucia glanced around again—this time rather stealthily—at Lady Theobald. Then she glanced back at Octavia.

"But it isn't," she said, in an undertone.

Octavia began to laugh. They were on a new and familiar footing from that moment.

"I said 'it might,'" she answered.

She was not afraid, any longer, of finding the evening stupid. If there were no young men, there was at least, a young woman who was in sympathy with her. She said:

"I hope that I shall behave myself pretty well, and do the things that I am expected to do."

"Oh!" said Lucia, with a rather alarmed expression. "I hope so. I—I am afraid you would not be comfortable if you didn't."

Octavia opened her eyes as she often did at Miss Belinda's remarks, and then suddenly she began to laugh again.

"What would they do?" she said, disrespectfully. "Would they turn me out, without giving me any tea?"

Lucia looked still more frightened.

"Don't let them see you laughing," she said. "They—they will say you are giddy.'

"Giddy!" replied Octavia. "I don't think there is anything to make me giddy here."

"If they say you are giddy," said Lucia, "your fate will be sealed, and, if you are to stay here, it really will be better to try to please them a little."

Octavia reflected a moment.

"I don't mean to dis-please them," she said, "unless they are very easily displeased. I suppose I don't think very much about what people are saying of me. I don't seem to notice."

"Will you come now and let me introduce Miss Egerton and her sister?" suggested Lucia, hurriedly. "Grandmamma is looking at us."

In the innocence of her heart Octavia glanced at Lady Theobald, and saw that she was looking at them, and with a disapproving air.

"I wonder what that's for?" she said to herself; but she followed Lucia across the room.

She made the acquaintance of Misses Egerton, who seemed rather fluttered, and, after the first exchange of civilities, subsided into monosyllables and attentive stares. They were, indeed, very anxious to hear Octavia converse, but had not the courage to attempt to draw her out, unless a sudden query of Miss Lydia's could be considered such an attempt.

"Do you like England?" asked Octavia.

"Is this England?" inquired Octavia.

"It is a part of England, of course," replied the young lady, with calm literalness.

"Then, of course, I like it very much," said Octavia, slightly waving her fan and smiling.

Miss Lydia Egerton and Miss Violet Egerton each regarded her in dubious silence for a moment. They did not think she looked as if she were "clever," but the speech sounded to both as if she were, and as if she meant to be clever a little at their expense.

Naturally, after that they felt slightly uncomfortable, and said less than before, and the conversation lagged to such an extent that Octavia was not sorry when tea was announced.

And it so happened that tea was not the only thing that was announced. The ladies had all risen from their seats with a gentle rustle, and Lady Theobald was moving forward to marshal her procession into the dining-room, when Dobson appeared at the door again.

"Mr. Barold, my lady," he said, "and Mr. Burmistone."

Everybody glanced first at the door, nd then at Lady Theobald. Mr. Francis Barold crossed the threshold, followed by the tall, square-shouldered builder of mills, who was a strong, handsome man, and bore himself very well, not seeming to mind at all the numerous eyes fixed upon him.

"I did not know," said Barold, "that we should find you had guests. Beg pardon, I'm sure, and so does Burmistone, whom I had the pleasure of meeting at Broadoaks, and who was good enough to invite me to return with him."

Lady Theobald extended her hand to the gentleman specified.

"I am glad," she said, rigidly, "to see Mr. Burmistone."

Then she turned to Barold.

"This very is fortunate," she announced. "We are just going to take tea, in which I hope you will join us. Lucia——."

Mr. Francis Barold naturally turned, as her ladyship uttered her granddaughter's name in a tone of command. It may be supposed that his first intention in turning was to look at Lucia, but he had scarcely done so, when his attention was attracted by the figure nearest to her—the figure of a young lady, who was playing with a little blue fan, and smiling at him brilliantly and unmistakably.

The next moment he was standing at Octavia Bassett's side, looking rather pleased, and the blood of Slowbridge was congealing, as the significance of the situation was realized.

One instant of breathless—of awful—suspense, and her ladyship recovered herself.

"We will go in to tea," she said. "May I ask you, Mr. Burmistone to accompany Miss Pilcher?"

CHAPTER XI.

A SLIGHT INDISCRETION.

During the remainder of the evening, Miss Belinda was a prey to wretchness and despair. When she raised her eyes to her hostess, she met with a glance full of icy significance; when she looked across the tea-table, she saw Octavia seated next to Mr. Francis Barold, monopolizing his attention, and apparently in the very best possible spirits. It only made matters worse that Mr. Francis Barold seemed to find her remarks worthy of his attention. He drank very little tea, and now and then appeared much interested and amused. In fact, he found Miss Octavia even more entertaining than he had found her during their journey. She did not hesitate at all to tell him that she was delighted to see him again at this particular juncture.

"You don't know how glad I was to see you come in," she said.

She met his rather startled glance with the most open candor as she spoke.

"It is very civil of you to say so," he said; "but you can hardly expect me to believe it, you know. It is too good to be true."

"I thought it was too good to be true when the door opened," she answered, cheerfully. "I should have been glad to see anybody, almost——."

"Well, that," he interposed, "isn't quite so civil."

"It is not quite so civil to——."

But there she checked herself, and asked him a question with the most naive seriousness.

"Are you a great friend of Lady Theobald's?" she said.

"No," he answered. "I am a relative."

"That's worse," she remarked.

"It is," he replied. "Very much worse."

"I asked you," she proceeded, with an entrancing little smile of irreverent approval, "because I was going to say that my last speech was not quite so civil to Lady Theobald."

"That is perfectly true," he responded. "It wasn't civil to her at all."

He was passing his time very comfortably, and was really surprised to feel that he was more interested in these simple audacities than he had been in any conversation for some time. Perhaps it was because his companion was so wonderfully pretty, but it is not unlikely that there were also other reasons. She looked him straight in the eyes, she comported herself after the manner of a young lady who was enjoying herself, and yet he felt vaguely that she might have enjoyed herself quite as much with Burmistone, and that it was probable that she would not think a second time of him, or of what she said to him.

After tea, when they returned to the drawing-room, the opportunties afforded for conversation were not numerous. The piano was opened, and one after another of the young ladies were invited to exhibit their prowess. Upon its musical education Slowbridge prided itself. "Few towns," Miss Pilcher frequently remarked, "could be congratulated upon the possession of such talent and such cultivation." The Misses Egerton played a duet, the Misses Loftus sang, Miss Abercrombie "executed a sonata with such effect as to melt Miss Pilcher to tears; and still Octavia had not been called upon. There might have been a reason for this, or there might not; but the moment arrived, at length, when Lady Theobald moved towards Miss Belinda with evidently fell intent.

Be Careful What You Eat.

"There is one error in diet," said the doctor, "which, if pursued for a not very long time, is certain to result in death."

"What is that, doctor?" asked the patient, anxiously.

"Not eating anything," said the doctor, grimly, and shaking the patient's feeble hand feebily he tottered to the door.—Burdette in Brooklyn Eagle.

A very Queer Material.

Mr. Snagge—Well, I never expected they would make steamship tickets of celluloid.

Mrs. Snagge—Oh, they are not!

THE GENTLER SEX.

Little Items of Interest from the World of Fashion.

The fashion in furs next winter may be confidently expected to lean chiefly to the skin of the Bokharan caracal, a kind of lynx, about the size of a fox.

A new light wool fabric is called Austrian serge. It is beautifully fine, and as it does not wrinkle easily, like Henrietta cloth, it is destined to take its place in the formation of utility costumes.

The fiat has gone forth in London's best society that bare arms will appear as much at dressy afternoon teas, kettledrums, lunches, and other post meridian fetes, as in the evening. The hair will be powdered, the long gloves drawn off, and then fair rounded arms will emerge from laces and draperies bare to, and above, the elbows, without bracelets, but the fingers glittering with costly rings.

The popularity of the sailor hat is still so great that milliners both here and abroad are using these simple flat-crowned, straight-brimmed shapes for airy models in net and tulle.

The buff shoe's economic side
By all should be beholden;
Although it is the summer's pride,
How well it fits the autumn-tide,
So russet and so golden.

Rust color will be the fashionable red next winter.

Zouave jackets will be a feature of winter fashions.

English walking jackets are made a trifle longer this season than last.

Silk petticoats are now lined with flannel. This obviates the necessity of wearing more than one.

Cloth dresses are made with tight-fitting sleeves, as full sleeves of so thick a material could not be worn with autumn and winter jackets.

An idea for table decoration is to have a wreath of flowers edge the table, so divided that they may be used as boutonnieres by the guests when they are seated.

The tan shoe may have a permanent future after all. One of the results of the recent manœuvres of the British fleet has been the suggestion that the marines should wear tan or brown shoes henceforth instead of black ones, and brown gloves instead of white.

A SUMPTUOUS COSTUME.

One of fashion's pet projects just now is to find novel ornamentations for dress waists. It was at a recent Newport luncheon, says Table Talk, that one lady wore a costume of beige-tinted glorioso silk, a material of high lustre, that is finding rare favor at present, touched off with rolling collar and deep cuffs of tan-colored Suede kid. Odder still is the fancy for using bands of real silver for trimming. The metal is rolled out very thin, and is laid over a foundation of cloth, silk, etc. For revers, collars and cuffs, as may be surmised, this trimming is most effective, especially, as was recently instanced, when it is used on a charming dinner toilet of Sevres blue Japanese crepe—a fabric, by the way, that has a far heavier mesh than Chinese crepe, and is therefore the more durable.

NEAT FOOTWEAR.

A pair of bathing sandals recently made for Lady Colin Campbell have uppers of navy blue canvas, goffered and eyeletted. The lacing runs from the instep to tolerably high in the leg, but nowhere do the sides meet when the sandal is worn. No covering at all is furnished for the toes, but the sole comes well to the front. Two loops of gut are inserted in the sole, one for the big toe and one for the small one. The uppers are edged with red, and in color and design match Lady Colin Campbell's bathing dress.

Met Her Father's Fate.

The remains of Miss Sadie Kelly, who was killed in the recent accident at Chicago, by a freight train running into a passenger car, were brought here on Friday for burial. They were accompanied by a couple of gentlemen from Chicago. A beautiful wreath of white roses, representing "Gates Ajar," and a white dove, which was placed on the coffin by Chicago friends, were greatly admired. She was buried out in Johnston Cemetery, Euphemia, near her former home. The young lady had a most painful experience during the past year. Last spring she was called from Chicago to identify the remains of her father, who was killed at the Hamilton Junction accident. A couple of days previous to her own sad death an intimate lady friend of hers was accidentally killed, and her remains brought to the same house where Miss Kelly resided, and now she lies in the grave the victim of a shocking accident, caused, it is said, by the incapacity through drink of the engineer of the freight train. Miss Kelly was only 18 years of age, and was exceptionally clever. The wreath which accompanied the remains was presented by her fellow employees at the Rock Island depot.—Bothwell Times.

Slighted the Pie.

Matron—I suppose you find your husband as selfish as most men.

Bride—No, indeed. I often heard that a man gobbled up all the nice things on the table, but I must say that my husband leaves nearly all the pies I make for me to eat myself. He's dreadfully kind to me."

Nearly 2,000 English churches have adopted the use of unfermented wine at communion.

A young man named Charles Edward Fatch, aged 21, who committed suicide at Leeds, left behind him an extraordinary letter addressed to a young woman named Morley, in which he said: "I am going to commit suicide on Friday morning, as I want to be buried on bank holiday, Monday, so that I shall disappoint my cousin Annie, who is to be married on that day, so there will be a funeral instead of a wedding. I hope you will attend my funeral. I will meet you in heaven." The jury found that the deceased committed suicide whilst of unsound mind.—London Standard.

Chewing gum puzzles the French newspapers. They announce that the most elegant American ladies, married and unmarried, have developed a singular passion for chewing India rubber.

Mr. Wilson Barrett will play "The Lord Harry" over here next season. This is the drama that he produced originally at the Princess Theatre, London, which ran three months there two years ago.

THE FAIR SEX.

A Column of Interesting Reading for the Ladies.

THE USEFUL AND THE ORNAMENTAL

Notes of Fashions and Fashionable Folks.

The Effects of Tight Lacing.

Now that rational ideas as to dress have acoquired a definite place in public esteem, it may be imagined that the practice of tight lacing and customs of a like nature, if known at all, are not what they used to be. A case of sudden death lately reported from Birmingham proves that it is still too early to indulge in such illusory ideas. The deceased, a servant girl of excitable temperament, died suddenly in an epileptoid fit, and the evidence given before the coroner respecting her death attributed the fatal issue to asphyxia, due in a great measure to the fact that both neck and waist were unnaturally contracted by her clothing, the former by a tight collar, the latter by a belt worn under the stays. We have here certainly those very conditions which would lead us to expect the worst possible consequences from a convulsive seizure. There is no organ of the body whose free movement is at such times more important than the heart. Yet here we find, on the one hand, its movement hampered by a tight girdle so placed that it could with difficulty be undone at a critical moment; on the other, a contrivance admirably adapted to allow the passage of blood to the brain, while impeding its return. This is no isolated case as regards its essential character, though, happily, somewhat singular in its termination. Minor degrees of asphyxiation, we fear, are still submitted to by a good many self-torturing children of vanity. The tight corset and the high heel still work mischief on the bodies of their devoted wearers. Taste and reason, indeed, combine to deprecate their injurious and vulgar bondage, and by no means unsuccessfully. Still the evil maintains itself. Cases like that above mentioned ought to, if they do not, open the eyes of some self-worshippers of the other sex who heedlessly strive by such means to excel in a sickly grace. We would strongly impress upon all of this class the fact that beauty is impossible without health, and would advise them, in the name of taste as well as comfort, to avoid those methods of contortion, one and all, by which elegance is only caricatured and health may be painfully and permanently injured.—London Lancet.

The Tea Gown.

The day of the tea gown has by no means passed. Quite the contrary, it seems to have just dawned, so popular has this most comfortable garment become in our own country, as well as in England. Even French modistes have made more charming confections on this model. Madame Jane Hading particularly has helped make this style of dress popular with the simple grace with which she wears it. Sarah Bernhardt often appears in a sublimated tea gown, known by some other name, perhaps, but a tea gown just the same and a most graceful one. Flimsy materials are no longer the only ones used in the construction of the tea gown. Brocades, silk poplins and such silken stuffs are much more favored this season, at least for the main part of the gown, while for the front soft gossamer stuffs are preferred still and give the character to the gown. Lovely embroideries are lavished on the new cut tea gowns in preference to lace, which has so long been the only adornment allowed on this graceful garment. A regal model in a tea gown from a famous house in Paris had a fine and delicate embroidery in gold threads on a rich, dark, red, eastern silk. A net of old point de Venise made a drapery in the front and was caught in place by a golden girdle. A robe fit for a princess most truly was such a tea gown. Creamy white with gold embroidery also makes an exquisite combination in the tea gown and one which is always becoming.

Travelling Dresses.

Correspondents who have asked suggestions for travelling dresses for autumn are advised to get faced cloth of light quality and make a princess coat; or, if a separate bodice is preferred, a good plan is to have a coat bodice, which is a cuirasse basque of even length around the hips and back. This bodice should open over a pleated vest of light armure silk, which has a velvet yoke and collar at the top and three straps of velvet ribbon across the waist line, each fastened by a buckle. The large coat sleeves have a pointed puff of the velvet at the top and of the silk at the wrists, with two velvet straps and buckles besides. The skirt is straight and full in the back, with loosely pleated side breadths and the front breadth draped in pleats on the hips; there are five or six rows of velvet ribbon placed beside these pleats, each row ending in a point and holding a buckle. The design is prettily carried out in brown or in green cloth, with ecru or gray armure for the vest and a velvet yoke and straps the color of the cloth edged with gilt or silver cord; the buckles match the metal of the cord. One of the long cloaks described above or else a short directoire cape will add sufficient warmth. A small bonnet or toque made of the cloth of the dress with a velvet bow, some pheasants' feathers, or a blackbird on the left side and narrow velvet ribbon strings, should complete the toilette.—Harper's Bazar.

Winsomeness in Women.

Do you recollect what your feelings were immediately after you had spoken the first unkind word to your husband? Did you not feel ashamed and grieved, and yet too proud to admit it? That was, is, and ever will be, your evil genius! It is the temper which labors incessantly to destroy your peace, which cheats you with an evil delusion that your husband deserved your anger, when he really required your love. If your husband is hasty, your example of patience will chide as well as teach him. Your violence may alienate his heart, and your neglect impel him to desperation. Your soothing will redeem him—your softness subdue him, and the good-natured twinkle of those eyes, now filling with tears, will make him all your own.—Catholic Standard.

The Next Bride.

A novel wedding fancy was recently inaugurated by a fashionable bride in New York. She carried an unusually large bouquet, and just before leaving for the honeymoon she untied her flowers, which proved to be eight separate posies, fastened with different colored ribbons. Each of these was presented to a bridesmaid, and one of the bouquets concealed a wedding ring, which would indicate the next bride. This idea resembles the custom of putting a ring, thimble and money in the Christmas pudding, marking the finder's lot, respectively, of matrimony, spinsterhood or wealth.—Fort Worth Gazette.

Corsets With Very Long Waists.

The corsets shown indicate a tendency toward abnormally long waists. Two of these are accurately drawn in the illustration, and at the time of my sketch they were being critically viewed by two girls whom generous nature had so shaped as to preclude them from ever wearing those same configurating articles. It will be easy enough for attenuated women to remove the artificial layers from their hips, and practically extend their waists to their knees if they choose, but liberally rounded creatures will have to be content with their luxuriousness, and give up the idea of making themselves long-waisted, no matter what fashion may make them long to do.—New York letter in Cincinnati Inquirer.

Mrs. Carnot.

Speaking of the wife of the President of France a correspondent says: "Mme. Carnot is of medium height, olive complexion, Roman features. Her carriage has possibly a suggestion of self-consciousness, which may be wholly due to her intensity of eye, an intensity at once to be explained by her deafness. She spends her mornings habitually in the privacy of domestic duties. She looks personally after the education of her children. She speaks English with the English governess, Italian with the Italian. She reads the best literature in the hours of seclusion with her husband and friends, and is as well informed as he about everything that is going on in the world."

Wisdom for Women.

Homely people make the best friends.

There never was a marriage in which one party did not impose on the other.

To flatter a young woman, ask her about her victims; every girl likes to think she has victims.

Nothing pleases a man so much as to see a fine-looking woman who has been married two or three months.

A beautiful woman pleases the eye, a good woman pleases the heart; one is a jewel, the other a treasure.—Napoleon I.

There never lived a woman who did not wish she was a man. There never lived a man who wished he was a woman.

A sure sign that a girl is going to get married—when she sits around working pillow shams and tidies with an initial that is not her own.

Elegant Mourning.

The most elegant dresses to be worn as deep mourning are made of a combination of two kinds of crape, the greater portion of the dress being of the lustreless canton crape trimmed with the wrinkled English goods.

A handsome gown of this description has a round waist, with a yoke of English crape, into which is gathered a full blouse, the ruffle of which is fastened down with fancy stitching and arranged in tucks at the belt. The sleeves are full with deep cuffs. The skirt has front and side draperies of the soft material, with inserted panels of the English crape.

Another beautiful dress is of crape, with a front of fish net finished with embroidered vandyke points. A deep fringe of crape ornaments the left side. The waist is entirely of the crape, with gypsy fronts of the net, which is also used for the tight undersleeves, with puffed outside pieces of the crape.

Early Fall Wrap.

This dainty little vetement may be made of cloth or of the costume fabric. The one pictured is made of hazel-brown faced cloth, braided all over with dark-brown soutache in an escurial pattern. The fronts are extended into narrow tabs, which cross at the waist and are knotted together at the back. The coachman's cape, in sets of three or four, is extremely popular with young ladies, and to a great extent will take the place of jackets. Among the latter there is one of the "Incroyable" type, which has double revers pointed in front, the upper one of the coat material, lengthening into a deep, square collar covering the shoulders, while the under revers of different material and lighter shade shows about two inches below the other, the point extending well out upon the arm. The coat fastens with three large buttons below the bust, while the skirt part is straight over the hips, with a few plaits at the back, and the cuffs and pockets are double like the revers. Around the throat is a scarf of crepe lisse, Indian mull, soft silk, or some similar fabric tied in a large bow, the ends being tucked in the open front.—Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.

Mirth is Beauty.

The New York World says: "Mirth, cheerfulness, animation and other expressions of a happy spirit or a vivacious mood are to beauty what fragrance is to the rose—its soul, its subtlest charm. The doll-faced girls who have no expression are never anything more than pretty. Beauty is something deeper than color, something finer than regularity of features. Many a woman who lacks the charm of prettiness is seen to be beautiful when she speaks and smiles. What constitutes beauty is a theme as old as love. It has been the puzzle of poets, the despair of artists. The bias of affection or conformity to an ideal makes nearly all women attractive to somebody. But the one thing which enters into and enhances all beauty is the smile that reflects sunshine in the heart." Think of this, girls! With a little effort, and no outlay of capital, you can all be beautiful.

Scotch Camel's Hair.

A new fall fabric that is sure to achieve much popularity is a soft Scotch camel's hair that comes in dull shades of brown, green and gray, or a handsome Scotch plaid that has of late been adopted by the Duchess of Fife and worn when walking or driving about her husband's Highland estates. The beautiful Miss Leighter, who made her debut at Newport during the summer season, has an autumn gown of the plaid. Red and brown lines on a clear green ground are her colors. The skirt is heavily kilted the whole way around; the only relief in the draperies is a long fringed plaid scarf knotted at the left hip, and a round short coat is slipped over the loose cashmere skirt. Broad, solid, low-heeled walking shoes are worn.

A Eulogy on Silk.

Silk is an agreeable and healthy article. Used in dress it retains the electricity of our bodies; in the drapery of our rooms and furniture covers it reflects the sunbeams, giving them a quicker brilliancy, and it heightens colors with a charming light. It possesses an element of cheerfulness, of which the dull service of wool and linen are destitute. It also promotes cleanliness, will not readily imbibe dirt, and does not harbor vermin as kindly as wool does. Its continually growing use by man, accordingly, is beneficial in many ways. Grace and beauty, even, owe something to silk. You cannot stiffen it like thick woollen or linen without destroying all its gloss and value. The more silk ribbons, therefore—the more silk kerchiefs and robes are used instead of linen and wool—the more graceful becomes the outward aspect of mankind. A number of strange, grotesque fashions originating in the use of linen would never have been invented during the more general employments of silk. The flattering of ribbon, the rustling and flowing skirts of silk, the silk kerchief loosely knotted round the neck, have materially contributed to make our customs more natural and pleasing to the eye.—Exchange.

Fashions and Fashionable Folks.

Mrs. Tsui Kwo Ying, wife of the newly-appointed Chinese Minister, has nineteen finger tips, with which she jewels the long nails of her last three fingers. These quaint thimbles are as much like the beak of a woodpecker as anything you can imagine. Some are gold, some filagree silver, others are of shell, and those for ordinary wear are modelled in ivory, to be worn in bed or the bath, or when the royal lady is bundled up in wraps. All are exquisitely carved. A very beautiful set of four, made of old gold, have bits of jade in mosaic for decoration.

The yellow room has had its day, the blue room is passe and the crimson and gold apartment, too emphatic to be æsthetic. Now it is white for brides, debutantes and young mothers.

Unsightly fireplaces may be converted into spicy, woody, sylvan nooks by a rustic arrangement of balsam, palm, bitter-sweet and mistletoe branches. The greens are piled up on the hearthstone unless they can be interlaced about the fender and apron.

A disk or wafer of sealing wax placed in the bottom of a glass bowl will give crushed ice a pretty, delusive glow.

The London Queen says that there promises to be an immense demand for fancy velvets. No wonder, for the new productions "are things of beauty, and a joy for ever." Many of the patterns are large, many are thrown on armure grounds, many on thick satin, and some patterns are entirely in frise velvet, while others show plain and frise blended.

Sommelier combs are used to ornament the toilet tables of fashion. They come in various shapes of pearl, ivory, shell and polished rubber, but the handles are copied from the blades, swords and battle-axes of long ago. You can have a Louis IV. sword in solid silver, a Charlemange blade done in plate that will outlast love itself, or an exact copy of Pontius Pilate's weapon of hammered silver that is a real work of art. Prices vary with the quality of the plate, but all the designs are pretty and showy displayed on a linen cover with the rest of the crystal and silver toilet articles.

Buy a silver bread platter with a snake design running along the edge, spread it with a doylie of drawn linen, put a loaf of crusty bread on it, have the butler pass it round the table, and the manner in which your guest breaks off a piece will be a measure for judging of his high breeding.

The ladies in the Blaine family would pass for native born Englishwomen in any part of the country. They are partial to low-heeled, broad toed shoes, flat effects in millinery and dressmaking and the invisible checks and hairline stripes that can only be had in stuffs from Leeds, Birmingham and Liverpool. The young ladies braid their hair as tightly as a Gretchen, plaster it with fine hairpins and cover their heads and foreheads with the severest of turbans. Mrs. Blaine wears black and gray, and unlike the ladies of the White House frowns at daylight jewels.

All of Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt's bed linen is made in France. The hems are finished in drawn work, and the great monograms of applique and batiste that embellish pillow slips and top sheets are inserted in the fine linen with delicate stitches of needle-work that an expert could not accomplish in less than a week's time. When these beautiful white clothes come up from the laundry they are folded in squares and tied with diagonals of narrow ribbons just as they were when they came from the Parisian shop.

Mrs. Burnett Hurt in a Runaway.

A London cable says: Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett met with a serious accident to-day. She has been living at Doris Court, East Grinsted, and while driving to the station to-day her pony shied and dashed up the bank. Mrs. Burnett was hurled out of the cart and fell upon her head. She was picked up unconscious, and is now lying in a condition so serious that a London doctor has been called to attend her.

A Cronin Suspect's Health.

A Chicago despatch of Wednesday says; Judge Baker to-day issued a writ of habeas corpus, returnable to-morrow, requiring the State's Attorney to show cause why Frank Woodruff, one of the Cronin prisoners, should not be released on bail. The confinement is apparently breaking the young man's health down.

Sixty girl candidates for the Mormon life of multiplex blessedness were landed yesterday from the steamship Wyoming and packed off to Utah. If they knew more about the country and its customs they would stop in Chicago, where divorce is had as easy and as often as one wishes. Besides, Chicago wants the World's Fair. And it has so few of them.

"Say pa, would you mind using the other end of the ruler for a change?" asked the bad boy when the spanking was over. "Certainly, Johnny," said his obliging father. "It is a poor rule that won't work both ways," and the spanking was repeated.

CURRENT TOPICS.

CINDERELLA parties art to be fashionable this season. In Montreal they are said to be quite popular already. Cards of invitation bear the words "Cinderella Party." The leading feature of these parties is that promptly at 12 o'clock at night a gong sounds and the guests immediately depart, as did the heroine of the glass slipper. By this means those who have to be at business on time next morning have a chance to obtain something like a night's rest.

FATTENING slaves in a park and feeding them up like animals destined for the table, and then leading them to shambles where they are slaughtered like oxen, cut into pieces, and shared bit by bit among hungry cannibals—such is the practice which is permitted, according to M. Fondese, a French explorer, in some of French, Belgian, Portuguese, and even British territories in Ubanghi. M. Fondese was sent out three years ago by the French Government to discover the sources of the Niariguillon, and having returned after the successful accomplishment of his task, he hastens to tell his countrymen about the terrible things which he had seen in his travels. The "fattening parks," or padlocks, are, he says, to be seen in each village, and contain men and women who have been taken in the war. The poor wretches take their doom philosophically, and some of them to whom M. Fondese offered freedom actually refused it. They eat, drink, dance and sing until the head "Fetish-man" comes around, accompanied by an orchestra of tom-tom and tin-kettles players, selects a sufficiently fat specimen, carries him or her to the market place of the village, and splits his or her head with a hatchet or scythe knife. The eyes and tongue of the victim are given to the "boss" fetish, and the rest of the body is divided among the atrocious anthropophagi. M. Fondese, who has gone right through the heart of the African continent, has brought several interesting reports back, which he proposes to read in a public meeting. Cardinal Lavigerie, the anti-slavery crusader, will undoubtly find a new incentive in his philanthropic work after having heard the testimony of the new explorer.—London Telegraph.

THE Vancouver, B. C., News-Advertiser recommends the cultivation of hops in that Province, as the experience of Washington Territory has proved that the soil and climate of the Pacific Coast are specially adapted for the perfection of the plant. One grower in the Puyallup Valley, who has kept an accurate account of the proceeds of his hop yard for seventeen years, states that the average yield for that period has been 2,000 pounds to the acre. During that period the average price has been 20 cents per pound or $400 an acre, and, after deducting all expenses of cultivation and picking, the net profit has been about $200 an acre. The quality of the hops raised is so superior to those raised in many other parts of the world which, until a few years ago, furnished the chief supply, that the prices they can be sold for in London are sufficient to cover all the expenses of transportation for so great a distance and leave the growers a good margin of profit. The price of labor presents no obstacle, as many of the hop pickers in Washington Territory are Indians from British Columbia, who annually go down for that purpose, after the salmon canning season is over. If, says the News-Advertiser, "some "of the speculators who hold large tracts "of land at high prices would offer some "of it at reasonable figures to persons who "would make hop gardens, they would find "their lands adjacent would appreciate in "value as soon as one season had passed "and the possible profits of the industry "were realised."

CONSCIENCE MONEY.

The Victim of a Kingston Robbery Receives His Money Back.

A Kingston despatch says: About five years ago J. E. Brown, merchant, of Delta, attended the Provincial Fair here. He started at night for the G. T. R. station, and when near it some men seized him and threw him into a vacant field. They then dragged him about 300 yards and gave him brutal treatment. After the men had robbed him of $130 in bills, a $5 gold piece, $4 in silver, his watch, chain, ring and other valuables, they left him in a dazed condition. Keleher and Ahearn were arrested, tried, convicted and sentenced to fourteen and eighteen months respectively in the Central Prison. Now, for the sequel. On Monday a stranger called at the Dominion Express office and handed in a package for J. E. Brown, Delta. On Thursday Mr. Brown received the package and found it contained the articles stolen from him, and a note asking Mr. Brown to insert the following notice in the papers:

John E. Brown, of Delta, who, a few years ago, was robbed of a chain, watch, ring and $130 cash, received a few days ago, through some unknown channel, as conscience property, the watch, chain, ring and $30 in cash.

There was also a note of inquiry in the box asking Mr. Brown how much money he lost. The writer intimated that if he (Mr. Brown) would give a notice in the papers, stating exactly what had been stolen from him, he would probably receive more. The works in the watch were rusted.

A Hired Man Who Shoots.

A Brockville despatch of Wednesday says; A man named Ephraim Haskins, living at Elbe Mills, about eight miles from here was this morning shot by James Pennock. It appears Pennock was paying addresses to Haskins' daughter, which displeased, Haskins, who discharged Pennock a few days ago. Pennock returned this morning, and a row ensued. Pennock shot Haskins in the groin, and also shot Haskins' son in the foot. He gave himself up, and claims he did it in self-defence. Haskins is very low, but may recover.

Jap Miller.

Jap Miller down at Martinsville's the blandest feller yit!
When he starts in a talkin' other folks apt to quit—
'Pears like that mouth o' his'n wusn't made for nothin' else
But jes' to argify 'em down and gether in their pelts.
He'll talk you down on tariff, er he'll talk you down on tax,
And proves the poor man pays, 'em all—and them's about the facts!
Religion, law, er politics, prize-fightin' or base ball—
Jes' tech up Jap a little and he'll post you 'bout 'em all.

And the comicalest feller ever titled back a cheer
And tuck a chaw tobacker kind o' like he d dus keer.
That's where the feller's strength lays—he's so common-like and plain.
They haunt no dude about old Jap, you bet you, nary grain!
They 'lected him to council and it never turned his head,
And didn't make no difference what anybody said—
He didn't dress no finer, nor rag out in fancy clothes:
But his voice in council meetin's was a terrer to his foes.

He's fer the poor man ever' time, and in the last campaign
He stumped ol Morgan county through the sunshine and the rain,
And helt the banner up'ards from a-trailin' in the dust,

My Mother's Pumpkin Pies.

When the beautiful autumn time has come
With its wealth of golden days—
When river and hill and meadow-land
Are veiled in a purple haze.
Down the backward track of the fleeting years
Unbidden my memory flies
To the autumn time in my childhood's home,
And to mother's pumpkin pies.

The yellow globes from the field were brought Amid rapture of childish glee,
For well I knew the promise they held
Of delightful things to be,
And mute and motionless I gazed,
On the scene with wondering eyes,
While my mother wrought the mystery
Of those famous pumpkin pies.

Meaty and juicy and sweet were they,
And conjured with infinite care,
With a thin, brittle crust of delicate brown,
And a flavor beyond compare;
And though I should live to three-score and ten
Yet oft will the memory rise
Of those happy times in my boyhood days,
And my mother's pumpkin pies.

MEN'S NECKWEAR.

The Kind of Scarfs and Ties that Should be Worn.

There is one undisputed axiom of fashion Here it is: A man evinces taste or the lack of it more forcibly in the choosing of his neck scarfs than in any other regard having to do with fine dressing as an art. Two treacherous elements enter into the consideration of the case—form and color. The shape of a scarf is mainly determined by the skill of the designer, and except in England, where Lord Euston or the Duke of Portland, or that exemplar of fashion incarnate, the Prince himself, determines upon some radical departure from beaten paths, it is largely an affair of convention, subject only to the usual venial modification of style. Color is everything. The scarf is the one item of apparel that admits of it. It punctuates and vivifies the entire costume, and is faultless and beautiful in proportion to the degree with which the devil of undue gayety and the deep sea of insipidity are avoided in its selection. The wearer's complexion is a matter of first importance. Men whose lead the rest of mankind follow—most of them without as much as suspecting it—have laid down certain precepts on the point which have acquired the force of inviolable laws. For example, says a writer in the Post-Dispatch, a man with swarthy features and black eyes should always wear a scarf of distinctive hue—say, black, deep blue, oxblood, red, maroon, violet, and kindred shades. Whether the scarf is illuminated with figures or not, the predominating tone should be pronounced. On the other hand, blonde men should avoid deep colors, restricting their choice to vague and uncompromising tints—such as pale blue, light pink, and the various blendings that produce gayer and more buoyant effects. Persons of neutral complexion and gray eyes should exercise the utmost care and precaution in the selection of neckwear. The character and color of one's garments exert another decided influence which cannot be ignored. If a man dresses in drab or deep black he should never, unless when in mourning, or when wearing a vest opening unusually wide, displaying a big area of white shirt front, wear a plain, black or somber scarf. To do so would produce a grewsome ensemble. The safer rule, it is agreed, is to seek a becoming contrast between the tone of the garments and the predominant hue of the scarf. There are men, however, who appear well dressed and who never affect any other color than black from head to foot. In the case of elderly gentlemen, especially if belonging to one of the learned professions, this exception is considered allowable, but at the same time the effect is exceedingly inartistic from the point of view of the man of fashion. The need for vivacious effect in neckwear this season is thought to be greater than ever, owing to the popularity of the cutaway and sack coats.

Modern science is extracting from the dry sawdust not only wood, alcohol, pyroligneous acid, the bases of the anilines, but many new compounds in medicine, etc., to say nothing of its being converted into wood pulp, or being pressed and utilized for fuel. Fortune and fame await the man who has the genius and skill to invent a contrivance or method to convert it into a cheap and merchantable fuel.

SAN FRANCISCO.

An Interesting Letter From the Great Pacific City.

Its Growth, its Topography, its Climate and its People—Overcoats in Summer—Sabbath Desecration — Whole - Souled Christians.

Having promised to give you a sketch of the city of San Francisco as I have seen and learned about it, I shall now proceed to do so, hoping that the readers of The Advance may find it interesting. Although some of the things may not be entirely new to a few of its readers, to the majority I think they will be.

The city of San Francisco has borne its present name about forty years, and only had a name since 1835, when the village of Yerba Buena was founded by the Mexicans. The discovery of gold in 1848 first drew the attention of the civilized world toward it, and so it is customary to date its history from that time, although it was not until 1849 that many braved the trials and hardships of crossing the plains in caravans to seek their fortunes in a new country. Many of these old pioneers, or forty-niners as they are styled, are still living here, and feel a certain amount of pride in having it to say they were the first who helped to make the city what it is. A few days after my arrival here, I had the pleasure of witnessing the commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of Washington's inauguration. One of the principal features of the day was a procession which took two hours in passing the building from which we viewed it. Through this means I gained much information that it would otherwise have taken some time to gain. Here were displayed the military troops, fully equipped for war, the navy, the sailors who were wrecked at Samoa, the forty-niners, (the two latter eliciting cheers from the crowd of spectators as they passed along) with their pack mules, caravans, etc., showing how they were fitted up for crossing the plains. These of course are only a few of the many interesting features of the procession, but what I wish to say is that the old pioneers and their sons were no small company. Enough of this.

The population is over 400,000. San Francisco may be rightly termed the city of hills, or a city set on hills. There are over a score of of them, some rising to an elevation of 1000 feet. The site on which the city is now built consisted in 1849 of sandy ridges and deep ravines. Much of the leveler part of the city has been formed by cutting down the hills and filling up the hollows. One can hardly give you a description of the enormous undertaking this is, or in looking at the city can scarcely realize how it has ever been possible to do it, and yet it is being done daily. The bay shore originally came up from half to three quarters of a mile from the present water point. It is made ground on which stands some of the largest warehouses, and most extensive business structures in the city. It is a wonderful and attractive city, and yet there are few Canadians with whom I have conversed since coming here, will admit that it is as beautiful a city as our own fair capital of Ontario. Yet on ascending one of the many hills on which the city is built, by night or day, you have a grand panoramic view spread out before you, reaching almost the sublime. The city spreading away and away, in the valley at your feet, then reaching the hill tops beyond, then again in the valley and so on, then the bay, then the plain beyond the bay, then the ocean; at night every hill top, from which shines an electric light, with the myriads of lights glistening in the valleys below.

The buildings are almost entirely wooden, as they are safest in case of earthquakes. They are artistically frescoed and carved in handsome devices. Being of wood entirely, gives it a sameness in appearance that stone and brick does not. The climate of San Francisco is somewhat peculiar, and is a climate by itself different to any other part of the state. In fact it is a common saying, and indeed a truth, that every five miles you go here there is a different climate. Six miles across the bay it is entirely different to what it is in the city. There is what is called the warm belt in the city. This is about five miles south from the principal business portion. Here it is a different temperature to the other portions of the city, and while the rest is shrouded in fog this portion is entirely clear. The summer season is not by any means the pleasantest part of the year. From the beginning of September until the beginning of June is considered delightful, June, July and August being very disagreeable, that is, there are cold, high winds with a great deal of dust, making it rather disagreeable to be on the streets. In fact it is very similar to Canadian March weather. Yet these high winds are what clear the city of all foul diseases, and one cannot help feeling them both fresh and invigorating. You would not wish to live here and not have the winds during these months. Of course there are some delightful days, but take on an average, four out of every seven are disagreeable. From the last of April until the beginning of October there is no rain, consequently when everything is commencing to look beautiful in Canada, it is beginning to look pretty brown and bare here. The hills around the city are brown and bleak looking, and everything through the country looks brown and dusty and dried up, and one cannot help wondering how the animals exist. Yet they do, and you see thousands of them grazing on the bleak looking hills, as you pass through the country, and all in fine condition. But so far as appearance goes as regards grass, it is parched and barren. However, were you to turn over a spadefull of earth at any time, you would find the soil quite moist. Therefore anything else that is deeper rooted than the grass, grows luxuriantly. In fact the growth here is something wonderful. The heavy fogs that fall every night take the place of rain to a great extent; then, too, vegetation never ceases.

We are now having, and have had since the middle of August, what Canadians consider summer weather. In another week or so rain will fall, and then everything will look beautiful after the first shower. But do not imagine it will be anything like our mild showers there. It usually teems down here. It is a very rare thing to have thunder and lightening, and I have been told by a number of people that they would much prefer the earth-quakes to one of our eastern thunder storms. They seem to be terrified by them, why, I do not know.

There have been two earth-quake shocks since my arrival here, yet nothing alarming. The loud rumbling sound resembled very heavy thunder, and the buildings shook for a minute or so. The first one took place a few weeks after I came, during the night or rather coming on to Sunday morning. At church I was assailed by a number of friends wanting to know if I had felt it. They are very desirous that all strangers should have the pleasure (if there is any) of feeling the shock.

Now, although the climate is so equable, it is very seldom you can go out without taking a wrap, especially in the evenings, and as for wearing thin or light dresses, I might say they are never worn. Gentlemen are rarely ever seen without their overcoats on their arm, no matter how warm it may be during the day, it gets very cool in the evenings.

All the year round you will see ladies with seal mantles down to their feet, immense fur boas around their necks, heavy mantles trimmed with fur and muffs in their hands. To those who have only seen these worn during a season of frost and snow, it is to say the least laughable. Yet I have seen them thus dressed when it has been 110 here which is considered is equal to 80 or 90 in Canada. For no matter how hot the sun is, there is always a cool breeze.

The Californians are famed for their hospitality and friendliness, and I must say I have found them to be all they are famed for, both in their homes, churches and elsewhere, and have already made many dear friends amongst them.

Would just say, you would have to hurry out of a church here, were you a stranger, if you did not have at the least half a dozen shake hands with you, ask if you were not a stranger, and give you a cordial invitation to come again. Here it takes about half an hour after every service for the pastor and most of the congregation to leave the church, as there is a regular social time amongst them in shaking hands and conversation. If there was a little more of this spirit displayed in some of our Canadian churches it would beautify the christian character of their members and make them more Christ-like.

THAT POISONED CANDY.

Some Important Testimony Before the Coroner's Jury.

A PACKAGE OF STRYCHNINE.

A St. John, N. B., despatch of Wednesday says: The MacRae inquest was continued this evening. Only four witnesses were examined, but the evidence was of much more importance than any before submitted, and indicates that the authorities have a good case. Thos. L. Hay testified to leaving Rev. Mr. Shaw's box of candy at the Globe office.

T. B. Barker, senior member of the firm of Messrs. T. B. Barker & Sons, said McDonald entered their employ about two months ago. He was engaged in the sundries department, and had nothing to do with the compounding of medicines. He left work at 6 o'clock each evening, and if there after that it was by request to do special work. McDonald had been in their employ some years before, but they knew he was not the same boy now, as he had been insane. He was always nervous, but they never noticed anything out of the way in his actions.

H. W. Barker, junior partner in the firm, said he considered McDonald mentally and physically sound when he entered their employ about two months ago, and he never noticed anything out of the way with him until Friday or Saturday last, when he seemed very nervous, and dropped a parcel he was doing up. He was shown the candy boxes and said they were similar to some imported by them in 1887 from S. R. Stewart & Co., Aberdeen, with combs in them. German strychnine, he said, was imported in one ounce parcels, consisting of eight drachm bottles. One parcel now in the store had only seven bottles, but he believed the other could be accounted for through the order book. He was aware that William Haines, the office boy, had lent his key to McDonald, who had a duplicate made, and as a consequence a new lock was put on the door on Saturday last. He did not know of any loose combs in their establishment, but the Coroner displayed eight packages, the contents of four boxes which had been found in the store by the police officers. They sometimes purchased paper from C. L. Nelson. He identified some samples of McDonald's writing, but could not identify the addresses on the candy packages as his.

W. B. Gerow, bookkeeper in Barker's, said he worked after hours every night in the week. He was aware that McDonald had a duplicate key of the office, and believed he used it, for he had found him in there on four different occasions. The first time was two weeks ago to-night, when he was writing a letter at the desk. A few days later he saw him in the back shop, at the end of a table in a stooping position, about fifteen feet from where the strychnine was kept. A week ago Saturday night he met him going out of the door about seven in the evening with a parcel under his arm. He explained that he had been trying on a new pair of boots. On the Monday night following McDonald came into the office about 7 o'clock and asked if Haines was there. He offered to assist with the work, but, being refused, went out. McDonald was always rational in conversation and very quick and obliging, but somewhat nervous. On Friday he was more nervous than usual, and hung about the office more than was his wont. Witness also noticed a peculiar look in his eyes and thought him sick. His suspicions were aroused somewhat, and on Saturday at noon he called on the Coroner and Chief of Police and examined the boxes, but was satisfied there was none like them in the establishment, and so reported to Mr. Barker. Afterwards he found the comb boxes. The broken package of strychnine was found at the bottom of the pile, with the wrong end turned out so as to hide the broken label, but it was possible the package could be accounted for.

This evidence caused much surprise, but some of a more startling nature is expected to-morrow evening.

A St. John, N. B., despatch of Friday says: At the inquest this evening considerable circumstantial evidence pointing to McDonald as the sender of the boxes of poisoned candy was adduced.

S. J. King, Post-office Inspector, said he was now satisfied the packages were mailed between 5.15 and 8.15 o'clock on Tuesday evening, October 1st.

H. B. Peters, head clerk in Messrs. Barkers' wholesale store, said he noticed that McDonald was more nervous than when he worked there some years ago, and his memory was defective. He considered him more nervous on Friday than usual. On Friday morning last he had a conversation with W. S. Barker, who said it might be some person in the store who had sent the candy. His suspicions were also aroused because McDonald had been seen in the store at night, when he had no business there. He found boxes in the store similar to those containing the candy. Barker's reason for suspecting McDonald was because he had been of unsound mind. Gerow had told him he did not like to have McDonald there at night, and Wasson had seen McDonald in the store standing at the desk the night the candy was mailed, but he disappeared in a few minutes. He was shown the entry book of the store and identified McDonald's writing, but would not express the opinion whether the letters "cit," of the word "city," in one order were the same as the letters of the address on one of the packages.

Police Inspector Weatherhead told of the arrest of McDonald and of searching his clothes, finding some brown paper the same as that the boxes were wrapped in, a memorandum book, loaded revolver, box of cartridges and some trinkets. He also searched his room in Mrs. Barker's house, but the only thing found was some more of the brown wrapping paper.

W. B. Gerow, the Barkers' bookkeeper, would not express an opinion whether the entries in the book were in ink of the same color as the writing on the packages of candy.

W. S. Barker, bookkeeper in the retail store, said he had lent his key to the wholesale department to McDonald on one occasion. He went on Saturday evening, the 21st or 28th September, and saw McDonald standing with his coat off behind the drug table. He said, "Hello, Will, what are you doing back here at this time of night?" McDonald replied, "Finish ish up some work." On Friday morning last he talked over the poisoning case with Peters, and both were of opinion that it was done by some person of unsound mind, and asked could it possibly have been McDonald. Peters said there was a bare possibility of such being the case. McDonald had asked him to go fishing on Sunday once lately, and when he refused started to argue with him, saying Sunday was the same as any other day to him and clearly showed that he had no religious belief.

THE CRONIN CASE.

Arrests for Jury Fixing—Important Movements of the Prosecution.

A Chicago despatch of Saturday says: Judge Horton issued an order for a special grand jury, returnable at 12 30 p. m., to investigate the attempt at jury fixing in connection with the Cronin trial. Al Hanks and Mark Solomon, Criminal Court bailiffs, are under arrest, charged with packing the Cronin jury.

It was about midnight when the special grand jury in the Cronin murder case adjourned. Their report was short and formal, except for an intimation that the jurors believed the plot to be more widespread than was indicated by the six indictments returned. All the indicted persons spent the night in jail.

Secret conferences and rumors of further arrests tell the story of new developments in the Cronin case. To-night the State's Attorney and his associates were in private session. All the lawyers for the defence were generally believed to be in close confab elsewhere. At 11 p.m. it was known that a new arrest had been made, and the prisoner taken for concealment to an outlying police station. Two other arrests were expected before midnight.

Edward Hoagland, who confessed to having engaged in a plot to fix the Cronin jury, implicates Kavanagh and O'Donnel as the men through whom he was drawn into the business. Hoagland says he revealed nothing until he was confronted by his mother, who inadvertently admitted his connection with the plot. Hoagland is not under arrest, but is obliged to report to the State's Attorney every half hour by telephone.

A NARROW ESCAPE.

A Fast Express Jumps the Track Near a Bridge.

A Rahway, N. J., despatch of Sunday says: The fast Philadelphia express train on the Pennsylvania railroad, due here at 11.13 a.m. to-day, made up of two combination parlor cars and three coaches, passed the main depot here to-day four minutes late, running 60 miles an hour. The engine, just as it reached the east end of the long bridge, jumped the track, and was followed by the five cars. The crash was terrific, and was heard a quarter of a mile away. The train ran along the ties for 200 feet, when the coupling broke between the cars and each car shot in a different direction. There are four tracks there, and the cars were twisted around in such a way as to completely wreck the roadbed for 500 feet and the cars themselves. Although the passengers were seriously shaken up, it is most remarkable that the only persons injured were two ladies cut by flying glass. Mr. DeWolf Hopper, the actor, was a passenger. The accident was owing to the spreading of the rails, which were new, and it is said had not been properly spiked. Traffic was delayed all the afternoon, while an army of workmen were building a new roadbed.

A GEORGIA FEUD.

The Victim of a Deadly Assault Takes the Law Into His Own Hands.

An Augusta, Ga., despatch of Sunday says: The second bloody chapter in the terrible history which began with the shooting of C. E. McGregor in his own yard on December 13th, 1887, was enacted upon the streets of Warrenton, Ga., yesterday, in the killing of J. M. W. Cody by C. E. McGregor. Cody had just ridden in from the country. McGregor walked up to him and fired three balls into him. Cody died instantly. Cody was indicted at the April term of the court with assault with intent to murder McGregor. Cody was under $2,500 bonds to appear for trial at the October term, but when the court convened Cody was not present, and although a bench warrant was issued for his arrest, he could not be found. McGregor said that he had decided that if the court would not punish Cody for his attempt to assassinate him he would do it himself. McGregor is an ex-member of the Legislature. Cody was a prominent citizen. Intense feeling prevails, and the citizens fear there will be further trouble. McGregor is in custody. A mystery surrounds the original cause of the trouble, but it is generally asserted there was a woman in the case.

An Infuriated Steer at Large.

A Saturday's New York despatch says: Two Texan steers escaped from a slaughter house in West 40th street to-day. One was afterwards captured in Riverside Park. The other, a harmless beast, wandered down town. The cry of "Mad bull!" caused a crowd to chase him to Broadway. The steer at length reached Madison square and rushed across the park. The animal was now pursued by a crowd of 3,000, headed by several policemen. He stopped at Eighth avenue and Twenty-fifth street exhausted. Twelve policemen opened fire with uncertain aim from a safe distance. Three bullets entered the steer's body, and he moved up a block bleeding profusely. The shots maddened him, and he twice charged the crowd, knocking down a dozen men. The crowd stampeded, and the policemen then managed with some difficulty to finish him.

THOSE DEADLY WIRES.

Edison Says No Insulation Will Make Them Safe—He Has a Plan.

A New York despatch of Sunday says: Expert Wheeler examined the electric light wires where the lineman was killed on Friday and reported before the Board of Electrical Control yesterday that they were poorly insulated. Mayor Grant then decided to have the wires cut down, but an injunction was granted by Judge Andrews, returnable to-morrow, ordering the Mayor not to interfere.

In an interview to-day Mr. Thos. A. Edison said: There is no insulation which will make an electric wire safe. When under ground the high tension wires will burn out the tubes, the dangerous current will creep into your houses, and will come up the manholes. There is one way, and only one in my opinion, and that is to regulate the tension under similar regulations as those governing the pressure on steam boilers. For example, one single shock of a five hundred volt pressure would hardly affect a man closing the current between two dangerous wires. You can increase the tension to 800 volts with accommodating blocks at five volts between, and while such a pressure might injure it would not kill. It would probably give simply a strong nervous shock, but, as for insulation, there is no insulation in the world which will remove the danger. The greatest caution cannot prevent a human being from occasionally closing the current. Perhaps yesterday the wires crossed in Harlem. A porter sweeping out some office can form a connecting link which will leave him dead; and, as I say, the subway will only be a question of burned-out tubes and of deadly accidents, perhaps less occasional. The only solution is to restrain the tension of the current as I have said, exactly as the pressure on a boiler is regulated.

Attaches of the Board of Electrical Control yesterday afternoon appeared at the corner of Chambers and Centre streets and commenced to cut down two improperly insulated wires belonging to the Daft Electric Motor Co. The wires were cut all the way up Centre street.

The autopsy on Feek's body was held in the presence of a number of physicians The unanimous opinion was that the man was instantly killed by the first electric shock he received.

The fund dropped into a box on the pole on which Lineman Feeks met his death was by to-day's offerings increased to $1,063.83. Hardly any one passed the pole without dropping something for Feeks' family.

A DREADFUL AFFAIR.

Mrs. Daily and Her Three Sons Burned to a Charred Mass.

A Bradford, Pa., despatch says: At Davis Switch, a small village thirteen miles from here, last night the dwelling of Patrick Daily was burned, and his wife and three sons, aged 13, 11 and 9, respectively, perished in the flames. While the family were at supper the father stepped to the cook stove to turn off part of the gas. He unintentionally shut the throttle light, and, on reversing it again, the house was filled with gas. An explosion followed and in an instant the entire place was in flames. The three boys and the mother fell on the floor overcome by the heat and flames. Mr. Daily rushed out for assistance, but all efforts to save the unfortunates were futile. The house was entirely consumed in a few minutes. The charred and blackened bodies presented a sickening sight. Mrs. Daily's limbs were burned from her body and her intestines exposed to view. Her flesh was cooked to the bone. The three sons were not so horribly burned as their mother, but their blackened bodies could not be identified until placed side by side. The gas pressure was very strong, the pipe running direct from a neighboring oil well to the cooking stove. Mr. Daily is severely but not fatally burned about the head and face, and is almost crazed with grief.

The Deadly "Live" Wire.

A New York despatch of yesterday says; An electric light lineman named John Feeks was killed at Centre and Chambers streets this afternoon by a live wire. He was employed by the Western Union, and presented a terrible sight as he died on the network of wires in midair, while the deadly fluid actually made his body sizzle, and the blood to pour to the sidewalk and over the clothing of horrified spectators. The accident, occuring in the middle of the day in one of the busiest parts of the city, was witnessed by a large number of people. The man's body lay limp and motionless over the mass of wires attached to the cross arm of the pole. The firemen brought a ladder, and one went up with a pair of shears to cut the wires. The man was found to be dead. He probably touched the electric light wire by accident. The body remained where it was until the firemen went to the factory and had the current turned off.

An Epidemic of Typhoid.

An Oakland, Md., despatch says: An alarming epidemic of typhoid fever prevails at Aurora, W. Va., fifteen miles from Oakland. It is said the entire neighborhood for miles around is infected. There is scarcely a family without one or more of its members prostrated, and in some localities there are scarcely enough healthy persons to nurse the sick.

All About a Love Affair.

A Piqua, O., despatch of Wednesday says: Henry Hoffman and Lawrence Hunter, each aged 45, courted the same woman. Hunter was the favored suitor. Hoffman became jealous and called on Hunter today. The men exchanged a few words, when Hoffman fired two shots into Hunter. Hoffman killed himself. Hunter cannot recover.

ROYAL TOASTS.

The Czar and Kaiser Drink Wine and Exchange Compliments.

A Berlin despatch says: Instead of leaving the Russian Embassy after a few minutes' stay, as previously stated, Emperor William remained to attend a dejeuner given by the Russian Ambassador. Count Schouvaloff presided, and the two Emperors and all their attendants were present. Count Schouvaloff, raising his glass, welcomed the Czar, and called for three cheers for His Majesty. There was a hearty response, and the band of the Alexander Regiment played the Russian National Anthem, the Czar speaking in French during the repast. Emperor William left the Embassy at 12 30 p.m. In the afternoon the Czar drove out in an open carriage, surrounded by cavalry. He visited the ex-Empresses Augusta and Frederick. On returning to the Embassy the Czar retired for a short time for rest and quiet. At 4 30 o'clock Prince Bismarck arrived and remained in conference with the Czar until six o'clock. The Chancellor upon leaving was escorted to his carriage by Count Schouvaloff. A dinner in honor of the Czar was given this evening in the White Hall of the Schloss, at which 140 covers were laid. The Czar, dressed in Uhlan uniform, sat between the Emperor and the Empress, facing Prince Bismarck. The Emperor, in toasting the Czar, said: "I drink to the welfare of my honored friend and guest, the Emperor of Russia, and to the continuance of the friendship which has subsisted between our houses for over a hundred years, and which I am resolved to cherish as a legacy from my ancestors." The Czar, replying in French, thanked the Emperor for his friendly sentiments and drank to his welfare. Turning then to Prince Bismarck the Czar raised his glass and drank to the Chancellor, who stood up, emptied his glass and bowed deeply. There was a similar exchange of courtesies between Emperor William and the Russian Ambassador.

Ex-Empress Frederick will give a dinner in honor of the Czar to-morrow. The invitations are limited to Royal personages.

The Russian Imperial yachts Derjava and Czarina have left Kiel, returning to Copenhagen.

SHOT HIS WIFE.

The Villainous Deed of a Drunken Colored Man at Windsor.

A Wednesday's Windsor despatch says: John Marshall, colored, 32 years old, has lived for some time in Windsor and earned a precarious living by working on the docks in summer and doing odd jobs in winter. His home is a one-story, three-roomed shanty, a mile and a half from town, on Goyeau street, near the Tecumseh road. Last night Marshall was discharged and paid off, and, in accordance with his usual custom, got drunk before going home. His wife upbraided him and he became angry. "Go split the wood for breakfast," said the wife. "I won't do it," was his reply. "You will breakfast in hell to-morrow," was Marshall's threat. Mrs. Marshall had heard him make threats before, and laughed at him. In the bedroom hung a muzzle-loading shot-gun. He got the gun and cocked it. Mrs. Marshall was now scared and started for outside. Marshall shot just as his wife was leaving the room. The charge of buckshot and slugs with which Marshall had loaded the gun a few days before tore through the woodwork of the door, and some of the shot entered his wife's right shoulder, making a bad wound. She fell on the steps and Marshall ran away. Neighbors heard the shot and took care of the wounded woman, but did not report the shooting, which took place at 9 30, until after midnight. Chief Baines detailed an officer to watch the ferry while he and others hunted for Marshall in town. Provincial Detective Fred. Campan and Patrolman James learned that the man had crossed to Detroit, and reported the fact to the Detroit police. Detective Baker and two Canadian officers found Marshall at 136 Rivard street this morning and arrested him without trouble, and he is now safe in the Windsor lockup. Marshall does not seem to appreciate his situation, and said after his arrest that he did not mean to shoot his wife. Mrs. Marshall is in a precarious condition. Her right shoulder is filled with shot and badly torn. There are four children in the family, the oldest being 8 years and the youngest 2 years.

HISSED THE FLAG.

Chicago Socialists Let Off Some Wind and Talk of Revolution.

A Chicago despatch of Sunday says: When the American flag was brought out by the janitor at the hall, where a Socialist mass meeting was held here to-day it was greeted with hisses. There were probably a thousand men and women present. The red flag was then unfurled and was greeted by a burst of applause. Sergius E. Shevitch, of New York, spoke. He declared the hanging of the Anarchists the gravest crime ever perpetrated in America. This and every utterance of the sort was loudly applauded. Shevitch said he was proud of the city in which the execution occurred, because he felt that one day it would be the Paris, the city of the revolution, of America. An awful discontent was smouldering in the hearts of the laborers, and would soon burst forth in fiery revolution. It was useless and idle to think this revolution would be peaceful. Several other speakers took a milder tone.

In the course of a crusade against gambling in Madrid a judge last night entered the Casino, one of the most aristocratic clubs in that city. He was an only son.

Sir Benjamin Samuel Phillips, ex-Lord Mayor of London, and second member of the Hebrew faith to occupy the position, died yesterday, aged 79. Last year he retired from the Court of Aldermen, and was succeeded by his son, Mr. George Faudel Phillips.

The C. P. R. express while coming into the London station last night left the rails when near the freight shed and plunged on to a switch. The track and roadbed were torn up for some distance, but the passengers escaped with a shaking up. A gang of men made the necessary repairs during the night.

Alfred Pugh was sentenced to three years in the Penitentiary by Judge Elliott at London yesterday for robbing his brother of a suit of clothes, a valise and an overcoat. The youthful criminal has served five years in the Reformatory. Since his sentence expired he has been mixed up in a host of petty crimes, which have made him a burden to his family. After stealing his brother's property he went off to Ingersoll and Brantford, where he lived for a week on the proceeds, and then on his return he stole a shawl owned by his mother worth $14 and pawned it. Seeing there was no relief his friends decided to let the law take its course.

WHAT COULD SHE EXPECT?

The Reward of a Faithless Wife—Her Lover Weds Her Daughter.

In 1882 Jacob J. Schwinn one day found himself without a consort, his wife Lavinia having departed with Charles A. Boeck. The couple went to Hamilton, Ont., but afterwards settled in Toronto, where Boeck kept an umbrella store. Schwinn instituted divorce proceedings, but the matter was dropped and Schwinn died later on, leaving his property to Betsy and Lavinia Schwinn, his daughters. About two months ago Boeck came here from Toronto and abducted Lavinia, a girl about 17 years of age. The other daughter, who is much younger, was taken seven years ago. Lavinia had been living on Genesee street, near Oak, with Mr. Wagner and Mrs. Wm. Schwinn, who were her uncle and aunt. A nice sequel has now taken place, the girl Lavinia, it is said, having married Boeck, leaving the mother out in the cold. Boeck and the girl are reported to have visited Buffalo, obtained some of her clothing and then departed. The property left to the girls cannot be touched until they reach their majority. Mrs. Schwinn, their aunt, is a trustee of the estate. It is thought that Mrs. Jacob J. Schwinn will probably return to Buffalo. —Buffalo Courier.

The Great Chicago Fire.

To-day is the anniversary of that awful Monday which dawned upon a ruined city eighteen years ago—a city of crumbled walls and smoldering embers, a city of homeless refugees. Far to the northward the billow of fire was still sweeping, devouring as long as there was anything to devour, inundating homes and property, and turning into ashes with its fiery spray the hoarded savings of the people. The fugitives took refuge on the lake shore, even pressing into the water as far as they dared, while upon them rained cinders. Truly to them it seemed that the world itself was come to an end. The signs were fulfilled. The elements had melted with fervent heat; the moon was as sackcloth and the sun as blood; the heavens rolled together as a scroll. In the mad rush for a place of safety the common instincts of humanity, the consideration for the comfort of others which makes life ordinarily endurable, were all forgotten. "Save himself who can;" was the universal cry. The avenues of escape were choked with vehicles, and many fell never more to rise. Scarcely less awful than the vision of the Apocalypse must have been that day. The features of the people, distorted by fear, blackened by cinders and reddened by the heat, in little resembled those of human beings. They were more like those of "shapes hot from Tartarus." It is hard to picture all this. It is hard to think of Chicago, now so populous and so prosperous, lying an open waste from DeKoven street northeastward to Lincoln Park; yet so it was. The southwest gale swept the flames before it, and in that mighty reverberatory furnace iron burned like resin and solid stone crumbled into flakes. All day long the fire raged, ever eating its way northward. Night came and the cool rain fell upon thousands of homeless ones whose only shelter was the sky and whose only bed was the earth. Surely if ever there was occasion to despair then was that occasion. The hoardings of a lifetime had been destroyed in a moment. Capitalists were penniless. There was nothing left but standing-room; yet that was enough. The mournful toll of the court house bell as it crashed downward from the blazing cupola was not the death-knell of Chicago, as was feared. The great fire was only another exemplification of the great economic saying in regard to civilized as well as savage communities of men: They live from hand to mouth. So long as there were hands to work and a place whereon to work the city could not perish. A writer of the time says that within a week Chicago was as well off as ever. This may have been an exaggeration, but it is certain that in a very short time it was as though the great fire had never been. "All gone but energy" was a business sign frequently seen in the days which followed hard after that disaster. Nothing more was needed. The prophecies that Chicago would rise again have all been fulfilled. She has risen again, and more glorious by far than ever before. —Chicago News.

The Invention of the Thimble.

There is a rich family of the name of Lofting in England, the fortune of whose house was founded by such an apparently insignificant thing as the thimble. The first ever seen in England was made in London less than two hundred years ago by a metal worker named John Lofting. The usefulness of the article commended it at once to all who used the needle, and Lofting acquired a large fortune. The implement was then called the thumbbell, it being worn on the thumb when in use, and its shape suggesting the rest of the name. This clumsy mode of utilising it was soon changed, however, but the name softened into "thimble" remains.

A Door on the Track.

A Wilmington, Del., despatch of Sunday says: A south-bound Philadelphia, Wilmington & Baltimore freight train dropped an iron door on the track between Charlestown and Northeast, Md., which derailed a passenger train about 9.45 o'clock yesterday morning. The train was partly wrecked. Fifteen passengers were hurt, including Mrs. W. B. Guild, of Evansville, Vt., seriously.

The social sensation at Halifax, N. A STRANGE PROCEEDING.

A Buffalo Juror's Note to a Hamilton Man Engaged in Important Litigation.

(Buffalo Courier.)

When the case of the Ontario Canning Company against William Burgess, on trial in the Circuit Court, was adjourned on Tuesday afternoon to yesterday morning, and the jury were leaving the court-room, one of the number, Addison Rice, reached over and handed a small note to Egerton DeCew, the Secretary of the Canning Company, who happened to be standing near by. It was addressed: "Mr. Carpenter. Keep this note." At the first opportunity Mr. DeCew gave it to Mr. Carpenter. Imagine that gentleman's surprise when, upon opening the note, he found its contents to be as follows:

Mr. Carpenter—I shall be foreman in this jury. If you want help come to the Stafford House, corner of Carroll and Washington streets, at 7 p.m. Look on the register for my name. A. RICE.

N. B. Destroy this note.

Mr. Carpenter, who is the President of the Ontario Canning Company, immediately turned the criminating letter over to Lyman Baker, his attorney, asking if that was the way justice was done in Erie county.

Mr. Baker, Judge Corlett and the other attorneys in the case had a consultation, and when the court convened yesterday morning Juryman Rice was called to the desk by Judge Corlett and confronted with his remarkable epistle.

"Did you write that?" asked the Judge.

"Yes, sir," responded Rice, although considerably abashed, "and I can explain it."

"You appear here at 2 o'clock," said the Judge sternly, and he would hear nothing further at that time. The trial then proceeded with 11 jurymen.

Shortly after 2 o'clock court reconvened, and Mr. Rice was once more called up for examination. Upon being given permission he proceeded to make an explanation of his words and action, stating that he had desired to enter into business relations with Mr. Carpenter with reference to the sale of some canned goods.

Judge Corlett evidently thought this excuse a very poor one. "The import of the note is perfectly clear," said he. "You intended to negotiate in regard to the verdict in this case. There can be no connection between your being a foreman on the jury and canned goods. The court cannot overlook an offence as serious as this, for it strikes at the very foundation of the administration of justice.

"You have been guilty of contempt, and as the offence was committed in open court summary action can be taken. The sentence of the court is that you be fined $50 and confined in the Erie County Jail for 30 days."

A FEMALE ENOCH ARDEN.

The Strange and Romantic Story Recently Revealed by a St. Louis Divorce Case.

In a divorce case filed the other day in the St. Louis Circuit Court, entitled Marian Miller vs. Louis Miller, there is a most strange and romantic history, says the New York Morning Journal. Twenty-five years ago Louis Miller, then of St. Petersburg, Russia, was married to one of the nobility of that city, a beautiful lady of high birth, possessing all of the accomplishments that education and refinement could bring. After the marriage the couple settled down in their native city. The country was at that time threatened by the Nihilists. Miller decided to leave his native land and try his fortune among a free people. Bidding his wife a few months' farewell he came to this country and settled in St. Louis. Here he entered into business and accumulated a fortune. During all of this time he was sending money to his wife and receiving letters from her, but in a few months after he left home his mother, with whom he left his young wife, died, and the wife left to join her friends, 500 miles in the interior of Russia. All of this time the mails were very irregular, and, by orders of the Russian authorities, letters hardly ever reached their destination. The young wife received no letters from him and he received none from her, until one day a letter came to him with the sad tidings of her death. Years passed. During all this time the young wife could get no news of her husband. Thinking him lost she concluded to visit this country and learn if possible what had become of him. Bringing with her their son, who had grown to manhood, she landed in Baltimore, and the son came to St. Louis and engaged in business. Meeting some friends one day they asked him where his father was, and he told them the story of his father's life. They said the son looked like a man they knew, and he sent to his mother for a picture of his father, which was shown his friends, who took him at once to that gentleman. But in the meantime, in July, 1887, the father had married again and was living in fine style in this city. His first wife came to see him and the meeting between them was one of joy and sadness. Both wives, it is declared, loved the husband, but the good judgment of the last wife did not forsake her, and she said she would release him to again live and love his bride of years long gone by. Acting on this resolution she has, as stated, employed counsel to bring a suit to release her and him from the ties that bind them together.

SIR EDWIN ARNOLD.

He Gives His First Impressions of the United States.

(Frank Leslie's Newspaper.)

Frank Leslie's illustrated weekly has done me the honor of desiring to have a brief memorandum of the first impressions America makes on an Englishman. The natural answer would be, especially for one overwhelmed with pleasant engagements as I am, that the impressions of a traveller who has but passed over some thousand miles of these vast United States must of some necessity prove trivial and valueless. But, on the other hand, first impressions are always the freshest, and Talleyrand showed his usual cynical sagacity when he remarked to a young politician, "Never act upon your first impressions; they are always right."

Well, then, as I have passed from Canada down to Washington, and from Washington through Baltimore and Philadelphia to this great and wealthy metropolis, my chief impression has been the absolute practical identity of manner, mind and national life between our two countries. I have found myself everywhere in a transatlantic England. I do not say this in any foolish idea that to be "quite English" is a point of perfection. You may just as well remark that we resemble you; but there the fact is that bygone writers must have exaggerated most absurdly the supposed distinctive American traits, or else that you have ceased to exhibit them, for I have asked myself a hundred times, wandering in your streets and journeying on your railways, "Am I really in the New World, or dreaming of it in the old one?" Half an American as I am, by marriage and by sympathies, I must confess that it has been wholly delightful to observe this unmistakable and minute identification of the races, and it fills me with hope that, whatever other nations may quarrel and come into armed conflict, America and England—vainly divided by the ocean—will by and by establish an International Tribunal composed of the worthiest and best-trusted men on either side, and will refer to their judgment under the laws of right and reason—without appeal—every question which threatens to disturb the natural alliance that, in my opinion, furnishes the very best hope of mankind. Next, your magnificent distances, although I knew them well upon the map, amaze and absorb me in realization. It is wonderful for a British Islander to discover what a mere step upon your broad States a thousand miles make, and to conclude from what he sees what must be the life, the enterprise, the opulence, the energy, the natural and industrial resources, the boundless future possibilities of the territory he has not seen. A feeling of gladness and confidence about the earthly part of man's development beyond all expression has possessed me in perceiving how strong and sound your national vitality is; how little you are really spoiled in courtesy of manners, in civic kindliness, in social grace, and in reverence for law by your large liberties.

An Englishman no doubt notices here an absence of deference and of formal attention; but he also notices the presence of a nearly universal and most manly and frank comradeship, the blossom, perhaps, of a wider and healthier air. I am far from saying this to flatter America. The impertinence of such an intention would be rebuked by its absurdity. I would be like the little girl who was taken by Sydney Smith to see the turtle-tanks at Birch's in Cornhill, and when she stroked the largest among the collection, her uncle inquired: "Why do you do that, my dear?" "I do it to please the turtle, uncle." "My child," replied the Canon, "you might as well stroke the dome of St. Paul's to please the Dean and Chapter." A man who should, as it were, pat the cupola of your Capitol at Washington to gratify New York, would be similarly ridiculous. Your nation of 60,000,000 stands well beyond the reach of compliments. History rather waits to see if you will deserve the gifts and opportunities which destiny has brought you "in both her hands."

To speak of the countless delightful persons whom I have had the happiness to meet, is obviously forbidden; suffice it to say that your countrymen and country-women oblige the Englishman to quit each of their towns and cities with regret, so that

He drags at each remove a lengthening chain.

And then, how beautiful America is! I certainly did not know the vales of the Susquehanna and of the Delaware were so fair; or the gardens of Washington so gracious and spacious; or your homesteads generally so pretty. I better understand now Mr. Lowell's verses:

Binding the gold of war-dishevelled hair
On such sweet brows as never other wore.

But nobody, to my mind, has better understood, or expressed more nobly, the present and future greatness and the natural charms of America than your true poet and patriot, Walt Whitman, my interview with whom, when I offered him the tribute of a profound admiration, will be one among many happy memories of this journey.

I should not be an Englishman, however, if I did not grumble, and you must allow me to denounce and execrate the cobble-stones of your New York streets that rob the Briton of sleep by night and rack his bones by day; the snake fences, which waste alike land and lumber, and torture the eye of an artist; the lack of official luggage-porters at your railway stations, and those monstrous, ugly, unpainted telegraph poles, with which you mar the vistas of your finest streets. But your public buildings often astonish and enchant me; your colleges, libraries, museums and observatories leave positively no excuse to American youth. They must henceforth create and not import poets, authors, artists, sculptors, scientific geniuses and astronomers. You really owe us, with all your glorious chances, a galaxy of great names.

Such, then, sir, are some among those first impressions which you have been pleased to invite. They will appear to you, I fear—as to myself—entirely commonplace, but I prefer—at least while in America—to show myself grateful even at the cost of being dull. I am, sir, yours obediently, EDWIN ARNOLD.

CURING COLDS.

Hints That May Save Life if Taken in Time.

When one becomes chilled or takes cold, says Youth's Companion, the mouths of myriads of little sweat glands are suddenly closed and the impurities which should pass off through the skin are forced back to the interior of the body, vitiating the blood and putting extra work on the lungs and other internal organs. Just beneath the surface of the skin all over the body there is a network of minute blood vessels, finer than the finest lace. When one is chilled the blood is forced from these capillary vessels into one or more of the internal organs, producing inflammation or congestion, and thus often causing diseases dangerous to life.

The time to treat a cold is at the earliest possible moment after you have taken it. And your prime object should be to restore the perspiration and the capillary circulation. As soon, then, as you feel that you have taken cold have a good fire in your bedroom. Put your feet into water as hot as can be borne and containing a tablespoonful of mustard. Have it in a vessel so deep that the water will come up well toward the knees. Throw a blanket over the whole to prevent rapid evaporation and cooling. In from five to ten minutes take the feet out, wipe them dry and get into a bed on which there are two extra blankets. Just before or after getting into bed drink a large glass of lemonade as hot as possible or a glass of hot water containing a teaspoonful of cream of tartar with a little sugar if desired. Should there be pain in the chest, side or back, indicating pleurisy or pneumonia, dip a small towel in cold water and wring it as dry as possible. Fold the towel so that it will cover a little more surface than is affected by the pain. Cover this with a piece of flannel and both with oiled silk or better, with oiled linen; now wind a strip of flannel a foot wide several times around the chest.

The heat of the body will warm the towel almost immediately, the oiled linen and flannel will retain the heat and moisture and, steaming the part, will generally cause the pain to disappear. Should there be pain or soreness in the throat you should treat it in a similar manner with wet compress and flannel bandage. Eat sparingly of plain, simple food. Baked apples and other fruit, bread and butter, bread and milk, milk toast, baked potatoes or raw oysters may be eaten. By following the above directions intelligently and faithfully you will ordinarily check the progress of the cold and prevent serious, possibly fatal, illness.

To Measure Brick Walls.

Readers in many branches of trade will be glad to know this method of estimating brickwork, which is obtained from an authority on the subject: Ordinary bricks are about eight inches in length and with the mortar joint about half that in width, so that each brick on the flat will give a horizontal surface of about 32 square inches, or four and a half bricks will cover a square foot. As ordinarily laid there are nine courses to every 24 inches or four and a half to the foot. Four and a half courses with four and a half bricks to the course will give 20¼ bricks to the cubic foot. Waste, cutting and closer joints will easily require an allowance of 21 bricks per cubic foot, which will be found a very convenient figure for estimating the number of bricks required for a wall of given height and thickness, as it thus becomes unnecessary to find the cubic contents of the wall, but merely to multiply its face area or the product of its length and height in feet by seven fourths of its thickness in inches, which, as the thickness is always some multiple of four inches, is a very simple process.—The Artisan.

Sims Reeves, the famous English tenor, in his book of reminiscences makes the following extraordinary statement about Macready: "Strangely enough, this passionate man did not consider himself sufficiently irascible by nature to depict anger on the stage, and therefore employed (as I myself have seen) two unfortunate supers, whose business it was to make faces at him, tread on his toes, kick him and otherwise provoke him, until he was in a state of exasperation bordering on the demoniac. 'More!' he would growl, as he stood at the wing preparing to make a terrific entry; 'more, you beasts!' until an exceptionally severe kick happening to coincide with the moment for his sudden appearance, he would knock down each of his hired tormentors and rush upon the stage like a maniac."

A SPANISH HIDALGO'S PRAYER.

Peculiar and Ludicrous Mixture of Family Pride and Dread of Death.

One of the most peculiar and comical mixtures of a dread of death and family pride occurs in a prayer which a Spanish nobleman composed for his own benefit, says Texas Siftings. The prayer reads literally as follows:

"O Lord, Thou seest before Thee one of the greatest of all sinners of this wicked world, His Highness Grand Marshal La Meilleraye, Duke of Mazarin, Knight of Alcantara, Knight of the Golden Fleece, Grandee of Spain of the first class, Governor of Estramadura, Count de Menard, Baron la Porte and Grand Honorary Protector of the Church of St. Rochus, where His Highness partakes of the sacrament five times a year, his offertory never being less on each occasion than 100 pesos.

"His Highness condescends to acknowledge that he is the most unworthy of all sinners: and, O Lord, be kind enough to take his title and his long line of illustrious ancestors into consideration and condemn him not to the purgatory of the common herd.'

This Marquis La Meilleraye, who condescended to acknowledge that he was a sinner, never took the sacrament unless his coat of arms was stamped on the consecrated wafer. This is historical. He "condescended" to die in 1664. He was a typical hidalgo.

Great Railway Projects in Siam.

Even Siam is moving, and intends somebody, at any rate, to be civilised by railways. The surveys for the intended lines from Bangkok to the northern and eastern provinces of Siam are being rapidly pushed forward by a staff of surveyors under Sir Andrew Clarke, his arrangement with the Siamese Government being that the actual cost of these surveys is to be repaid to his firm. When Siam is properly opened up, its mineral wealth is certain to lead to a company "boom" on no small scale. At present both malaria and the labor question forbid mining enterprise.

THE FRENCH SCHOOLS.

The Minister of Education has issued a "circular of instruction" to teachers and trustees of mixed schools. It is not by any means in the form of an ipse dixit, but simply a mild recommendation which can at least do no harm. For we don't "must" gives place in every instance to the word "should." With reference to the use of unauthorized text books Mr. Ross has this to say: "It appears from the report of the commissioners already referred to that unauthorized text books have been used in some schools. These should be removed without delay, and the School Act and regulations in this respect strictly adhered to." Section 207 of the School Act stipulates that "In case any teacher or other person should negligently or wilfully substitute any unauthorized text book in place of any authorized text book in actual use upon the same subject in his school he shall for each such offence . . . . be liable to a penalty not exceeding ten dollars." Now, as these unauthorized text books have been in use in certain schools in Ontario for some time, and the above regulation has remained a dead letter in those schools, what can be expected from Mr. Ross's extremely mild manner of dealing with the defaulters but that they will continue doing just as they like in the matter, as they have heretofore? What are school laws good for, anyway, if they can be flouted as they have been in many instances which required a government commission and a sharp eyed Opposition to bring to light. It is to be hoped that the circular will produce all the reform that it pretends to be aiming at, but to us its "instructions" appear to be of the very mildest order—so mild, in fact, that those to whom they are addressed might even accept them as an encouraging wink to work away on the old lines.

The Baptist Home and Foreign Missionary Society, in session at Ottawa during the past week, deserve a good solid round of applause for passing the following resolution:

That in the opinion of this convention the acceptance by Baptist churches of the exemption of their church property from municipal taxation is inconsistent with our distinctive principles, and is an impediment to our work of evangelizing the world.

When all other denominations of the Christian Church recognize the fact that tax exemption is an impediment in the work of evangelizing the world a heavy load will be lifted from off the shoulders of poor people, and there will be a notable decrease of luxurious churches, with a corresponding increase of pure christianity, for ministers of the Gospel will then be obliged to "go out into all the world," whereas as it now, is many of them preach to indolent minds as well as indolent bodies, lolling in the pews of luxury. This is where the Salvation Army have got a lap ahead, to use an expressive phrase.

A despatch from Montreal states that "A. C. Burgess is suing the C.P.R. for $25,000 damages, which he claims he will lose by the cancelling of the privilege granted him to run the restaurant and news service in connection with the road." This goes to show that there is big money in the peanut and prize package business, which the C. P. R. is now running on its own account, and that the company recognized that fact when it bounced Mr. Burgess. Burgess, boudlion.

Balsam Valley Items.

From our own Correspondent.

Hulloo there, Mr. Editor! Oben has not given up the ghost yet. No sir, nor won't as long as he sees anybody else acting in the same manner. Undoubtedly you have been thinking seriously of late that I have not survived the mental depression which I informed you I was laboring under when I last wrote. But, Mr. Editor, if such were your thoughts, I, for one, am happy to state that you were laboring under a false impression. So you see that there is a possibility of even an editor being mistaken in his suppositions, as I feel sufficiently recovered to undertake the grave responsibility of giving the readers of The Advance an account of the principal events that transpire in this locality.

When I last wrote there were a number of buildings in process of erection, which are now full, or partly full, of vegetable matter of some sort. Those improvements add greatly to the general appearance of our neighborhood. We notice also a marked improvement in the dwelling houses. Mr. W. Stewart has had his private residence fixed up in a manner that makes it fit for a retired gentleman to live in. He has had a bran new roof of first class shingles put on, and plastered inside, so I think when he gets the furniture in, and the feather bed, and woollen blankets and heavy patchwork quilts surrounding him at nights (even though it be very cold this winter) he will not rise with the exclamation, "I was nearly frozen last night!" Mr. Archie Ferguson has built a kitchen to his dwelling house. He did it all himself without the aid of a mechanic. He had a lathing bee one night recently. A number of the young men in the neighborhood were present, also a goodly supply of the fair sex, who came in very useful by not being averse to taking a part in men's work. The boys worked in the presence of the ladies as if their reputation as workmen was at stake, consequently they got a great deal of wall ready for the plasterer, and after helping themselves to everything that was served each one hooked on to a girl and went home smiling loudly, and trying to make as much conversation as his vocal machinery would stand. Another improvement we must not forget to mention is noticeable on the roads, both in Egremont and Proton. Our worthy pathmaster, Aaron Earnest, opened up a good gravel pit and put considerable of the contents on the public roads, which benefitted the travelling public to such an extent that Mr. Stewart, pathmaster in the Proton beat adjoining, could not resist the temptation of that gravel pit lying there open for anybody's use who wished to come forward and partake; but although the pit offered no resistance, yet the pathmaster who spent time and labor in the opening of this pit (and as the people in this beat could not deserve the full benefit of it this year) resolved to put a stop to such encroachments. He quietly told the Proton pathmaster he had better quit, a request which was reluctantly complied with, after drawing a few loads, and in the late wet weather, that was the only piece of road that was not muddy in his beat.

Some time ago a very noisy meeting of the ratepayers of S.S. No. 14 was held in the school house. It appears there was some dissatisfaction prevailing in the section in regard to the teacher, who, we understand, belongs to a different sect to the majority of the ratepayers. The trustees were willing to re-engage her for the ensuing year, when some of the bigoted ratepayers said no. So they called a meeting to ascertain the feeling of the people. The meeting opened about eight o'clock and Mr. D. McCormic occupied the chair (he filled it all right, for it was not a very big one) then J. Campbell got up and told them what the meeting was for (the same as if nobody knew) and then he asked a few questions or the opposite to answers, such as Mr. A. told me that Mr. B. told him that I said so and so. Now he says (adressing the chief speaker) I deny the charge, and I want you to prove it. The opposition got up and answered, and both sides indulged a little to freely in personalties. Two hours later the house was in the same confusion, and they were just as far from the business they came there to transact as when they commenced, but by and by it was moved by Mr. Hasty and seconded by Mr. Aldcorn, that the matter be left in the hands of the trustees. The motion was carried by 2 of a majority, there being 24 for and 12 against. Those against the teacher could not find a single fault with her teaching, all they could do like the nobles of a certain ancient king, was to say she does not worship God the same as we. Even in this enlightened age we find that there are still a few who would prohibit all teaching that was contrary to their own views. There are a few passages of Scripture that could be very appropriately applied to such. "Why do the heathen rage and the people imagine a vain thing?" "If ye love one another, ye think ye do well." Do not even the scribes and pharisees the same? In conclusion I will say, surely the day of religious intollerance is past.

The S.S. which is held in the school house is still going on, and we consider it as a sort of spiritual food for the young children who attend. They are going to have a social on Friday, the 25th, 25 cents admission (per couple) all are welcome. There will be readings and recitations, singing and speeches by some Rev. gentlemen.

Miss Catherine Ferguson, of Minto, is spending a few weeks among her many friends here.

Mrs. McDonal has been very ill for some time past. We hope she may soon recover.

We notice that P. cor. has at length come down to hard pass and chosen for himself a name. Well, Vidi, I hope all concerned had a good time at the christening. OBEN.

Priceville.

From our own Correspondent.

Quite a number of cattle changed hands last fair day at fair prices.

Mr. M. Reiley, who went to considerable trouble in procuring suitable ground for the plowing match, is quite disappointed at the small competition.

A farmer was in town the other day explaining the good qualities of his "Beautiful Hebrews" potatoes.

About half past nine o'clock on Thursday night of last week, our citizens were surprised at seeing flames leaping above the tops of the trees, about a mile to the north of the village, it was found that the fire proceeded from a barn filled with hay, on the lot lately occupied by John McKechnie, commonly known as "Buffalo John." Origin of fire unknown. It is supposed that the company will withold payment of insurance because of the policy not being transferred to the late purchaser, Mr. Colan McLeod.

Mr. Robert Watson and Miss Sarah Ferguson, who were married on the morning of the 16th, and took the morning train for Orillia to visit friends there and in other points around beautiful Lake Simcoe, have returned and commenced house furnishing. Since Robert returned from Walkerton and set up business here, he has been one of the leading young men, and the society belles fairly beamed on him, until it was asserted that his attentions were not equally divided, but positively centered at the Squires; but at this crisis the "Doctor" appeared in our midst and is now the happy recipient of "society" smiles.

The Methodist parsonage was enlivened on the 16th by the musical voice of a young son.

Mr. Wm. Watson, sr., is visiting his daughter in N. Y. state.

Maxwell.

From our own Correspondent.

Mr. C. Neil's goods were moved to Feversham on Saturday, where Mr. Bruce intends starting a store.

Mr. and Mrs. S. Luck, of Markdale, were in Maxwell on Sunday.

Mrs. Thos. Clark left for Parry Sound last week.

Mr. and Mrs. F. Room will leave for Dundalk this week or next.

The young peoples' prayer meeting is well attended and so far the services are good.

While returning from Collingwood on Monday night, Matlew Spoffard met with a serious accident. The night was very dark, and Alex. Henry, who was with him, stopped at John Hudson's for a lantern. Mr. Henry had scarcely reached the house, when he heard a noise on the road, and on returning found Mr. Spoffard under the horse's feet. He was not able to stand and it is feared he has received internal injuries.

A GIFT!

SOMETHING FOR EVERYBODY

In order to secure another thousand subscribers before January next we have decided to make a great sacrificial offer for the balance of this year.

We have made arrangements with a publisher whereby we are enabled to make a magnificent gift to all our subscribers. We offer you your own choice from a list of splendid books, printed in clear type on good paper, or a monthly farmer's magazine for one year, upon the following terms: Every new subscriber remitting one dollar to us between the date of this circular and Jan. 1 next will receive The Advance for 1890 and balance of this year free, and may also select one from our list of books. And in order that all may fare alike we offer to our old subscribers, who will send in any arrearages and the dollar in advance for next year, before, or on Jan. 1, 1890, a choice from the appended list of books.

N. B.—The books will not be delivered until after Jan. 1, next, in order that all may be sent out at one time. Where they are to be sent by mail five cents extra, must be sent with the order, to pay postage.

This is a bona fide gift, made as an experiment, and the most liberal ever made by a local newspaper. The names will be enrolled as received and the books delivered in that order. Here is the list:

1. THE AMERICAN FARMER, monthly, for one year.
2. A House of Tears, by E Downey.
3. Sara Crewe and Editha's Burglar, by Frances Hodgson Burnett.
4. The Abbey Murder, by Joseph Hatton
5. The Argonauts of North Liberty, by Bret Harte.
6. The Fortunes of Philippa Fairfax, by Mrs F. H. Burnett.
7. Dr. Glennie's Daughter, by B. L. Farjeon.
8. A Mere Child, by L. B. Walford.
9. The Queen's Token, by Mrs. Cashel Hoey.
10. A Missing Husband, by George R. Sims
11. The Earl's Wife, same author.
12. An Algonquin Maiden, by G. Mercer Adam and S. Wetherald
13. Heaven and Hell, by E. Swedenborg
14. Stranger than Fiction, by Kenneth Lee
15. The Story of an African Farm, by Ralph Iron.
16. John Ward, Preacher, by Margaret Doland.
17. Buffalo Bill, by Ned Buntline.
18. Michael Strogoff, by Jules Verne.
19. The Gunmaker of Moscow, by S. Cobb, a capital story.
20. Maria Monk.
21. Robert Elsmore, by Mrs. Humphrey Ward.
22. Rudder Grange, by Frank R. Stockton
23. Ten Nights in a Barroom, by T. S. Arthur.
24. A Dangerous Catspaw, a detective story.
25. Helen's Babies, by Habberton
26. Ben Hur, by General Lew Wallace
27. Seaside Cook Book.
28. Day's Ready Reckoner, complete.
29. Chesterfield's Letter Writer and Etiquette, Complete.

Remember these two facts: You secure what is admittedly the best local paper in Grey, and get a present of another dollar paper or a book to while away the winter evenings. Our offer only holds good up to and including Jan. 1, 1890. Such another offer will, in all likelihood, never be made again. Do not put off sending in your orders until the last moment.

Even if everyone else has failed to make your watch or clock go, take it to Russell's, Flesherton, he will make them go perfect or no pay.

If you want a pair of good boots or rubbers or foot wear of any kind, try Wm. Clayton.

In giving the names of the committee of management as elected at the last teacher's convention, held in Durham, we unintentionally omitted the name of Mr. Dixon.

R. J. Sproule sold the bankrupt stock of Mr Chas. Neil, late of Maxwell, at Munshaw's hotel on Friday last. Mr. Frank Bruce was the purchaser at 66½c. Mr Bruce purposes opening a store at Feversham.

Our Manitoba correspondent desires to know what became of the "confiding bird" which built its nest on Mr. Richardson's verandah some months ago. It hatched its little brood, unmolested, and and is now probably repeating the operation in the balmy tropics.

At the same time subscribe for a first class magazine, The Cosmopolitain, which only costs you one dollar and forty cents if you are a subscriber to The Advance. Our clubbing rates and premium offer this fall are something unheard of in journalism for the amount and choice of reading matter given, and those who do not take advantage of it now will wait until doomsday before they find a better. Roll in you subscriptions.

Felt boots, felt stockings, rubbers, overshoes, boots and shoes, selling cheap and good at Wm. Clayton's.

The Thornbury paper of last week misleads its readers by informing them that the Thornbury markets are away ahead of any of the surrounding towns, when, as a matter of fact, the Flesherton quotations of the same week showed them to be in advance of Thornbury quotations in every instance, with the single exception of oats, which were 24c and 25c in Flesherton, while they were marked 25c to 28c in the Thornbury paper. Twenty-five cents was the sum paid at both places, while in all other respects our market prices were superior to those of Thornbury.

For lame back, side or chest, use Shiloh's Porous Plaster. Price 25 cents For sale at the Medical Hall.

There will be an auction sale of farm stock and implements at the residence of Mr. F. C. Bowers, lot, 33, con. 8, Artemesia, on Wednesday, Oct. 30, commencing at 1 p.m. R.J. Sproule, auctioneer. See bills.

One of our exchanges very aptly declares that those business men who daub up their letter heads and envelopes with a cheap rubber stamp, instead of doing the square thing by the printer and themselves, too, make nothing by it. Wholesale dealers and all large firms look with suspicion upon these nasty little daubs, and the man or concern who perpetrates them is rated accordingly. In commercial circles more importance is attached to styles of stationery used than some of our very economical friends imagine, and it is certainly a dead give-away on the standing of any business or professional man to practice this form of mistaken economy.

New Paper.

Wiarton is to have a second newspaper, to be called the Wiarton Encore. A Mr Isaac Post is projector of this enterprise. The new paper is expected to make its appearance this week.

Parlor Social.

The Ladies' Aid of the Flesherton Methodist Church will hold a parlor social at the residence of Mr. Jas. Beecroft on Friday evening next, Oct. 25 Everybody is invited to come and enjoy a pleasant evening of parlor games, refreshments, etc. Admission 15 cents. Tea from 8 to 9.

Barn Burned.

On Wednesday evening of last week the barn and contents belonging to Mr. Archibald McLean, Collingwood gravel, four miles east of Flesherton, was burned to the ground. Cause of fire unknown. Insurance will cover most of the loss. The barn contained 25 acres of grain, 10 acres of hay and the farm implements.

Send it Along

Our Mormon friends of Proton accuse us of refusing to print a reply which they allege was mailed to us from Dromore, in answer to the letters of "Anti-Mormon," which appeard in The Advance some weeks ago. The communication referred to never reached this office. We will be happy to accommodate the Mormon gentlemen with space in these columns, and informed some of them to this effect on the day of Artemesia fall show, but their reply has not yet been received.

Won The Prize.

It will be remembered that the E. G. Agricultural Society offered a prize of five dollars, which was generously donated by Mr. T. Kells, for the best essay on how to run a hundred acre farm. There were four essays entered for competition, which the directors decided to submit to Mr. Mills, of the Agricultural College, for his decision as to their merits. His reply was received last Saturday, awarding the prize to Mr. Joseph McArdle, of Hopeville.

Corrections.

The secretary of Artemesia Agricultural Society has forwarded us the following list of corrections to the prize list of the late show. The muddle was caused through errors of the judges in marking numbers. In draught horses – two year old colt, Mr. Burk 1st, J. A. McMillan 2nd. One year old colt, J. McMillan 1st, instead of C. McKinnon. Spring colt, Malcolm McInnis 2nd, instead of D. McDonald. General purpose span, H. McPherson instead of A. McKinnon. Brood mare, D. McArthur 2nd. Two year old colt, W. McMurdo 2nd. Hack horse, Joseph Cairns 1st, instead of G. Stewart.

Plowing Match.

The annual plowing match of the Artemesia Agricultural Society, held on the farm of Mr. Richard Whittaker, on the 4th con. of Artemesia, was very poorly attended, there being only four entries—three in the first class and one in the boys. To find a cause for this meagre attendance of plowmen would be hard. The fault did not lay with the directors, who were energetic in their endeavors to make the affair a success. The lack of interest exhibited has thrown a whole tankful of cold water on their spirits, and it is somewhat doubtful if they waste their time getting up another plowing match. This is a great pity, as it is something which should be encouraged. After the plowing was completed on Friday last, Mrs. Whittaker served up a fine supper to the plowmen and directors. Following were the prize winners: First class—Donald McLeod 1st, W. Burnett 2nd, Neil Sinclair 3rd. Third class—[illegible] McLean.

Lots of good horse blankets for sale at the Flesherton woollen factory.

The Philanthropic Editor.

Judge David Davis is the author of the following timely remarks: Each year the local paper gives from $500 to $5,000 in free lines for the benefit of the community in which it is located. No other agency can or will do this. The editor, in proportion to his means, does more for his town than any other ten men, and in all fairness, man with man, he ought to be supported, not because you may happen to like him or admire his writing, but because a local paper is the best investment a community can make. It may not be brilliant or crowded with great thoughts, but financially it is of more benefit to the community than the teacher or preacher. Understand us now, we do not mean morally or intellectually, but financially; and yet on the moral question you will find that the most of the local papers are on the right side of the question. To-day the editors of the local papers do the most work for the least money of any men on earth. Subscribe for your local paper, not as charity, but as an investment.

AN AMERICAN GIRL.

"Perhaps," she said, "perhaps your niece, Miss Octavia, will favor us."

Miss Belinda replied in a deprecatory and uncertain murmur.

"I—am not sure. I really don't know. Perhaps—Octavia, my dear."

Octavia raised a smiling face.

"I don't play," she said. "I never learned."

"You don't play!" exclaimed Lady Theobald. "You don't play at all!"

"No," answered Octavia. "Not a note. And I think I am rather glad of it; because if I tried, I should be sure to do it worse than other people. I would rather," with unimpaired cheerfulness, "let some one else do it."

There were a few seconds of dead silence. A dozen people seated around her had heard. Miss Pilcher shuddered; Miss Belinda looked down; Mr. Francis Barold preserved an entirely unmoved countenance, the general impression being that he was very much shocked, and concealed his disgust with an effort.

"My dear," said Lady Theobald, with an air of much condescension and some grave pity, "I should advise you to learn. I can assure you that you find it a great source of pleasure."

"If you could assure me that my I would find it a great source of plea might begin," answered the mu young person, still cheerfully; " I am afraid they wouldn't."

It seemed that fate had marked disgrace. In half an hour from the she capped the climax of her indiscr

The evening being warm, the windows had been left open, and in one of them, she stopped a moment out at the brightly moonlit grounds.

Barold, who was with her, paused

"Looks rather nice, doesn't i said.

"Yes," she replied. "Suppose we on the terrace."

He laughed in an amused fashion not understand.

"Suppose we do," he said. "I that's a good idea!"

He laughed as he followed her.

"What amuses you so?" she inquired.

"Oh!" he replied. "I am merely thinking of Lady Theobald."

"Well," she commented, "I think it's rather disrespectful in you to laugh. Isn't it a lovely night? I didn't think you had such moonlight nights in England. What a night for a drive!"

"Is that one of the things you do in America—drive by moonlight?"

"Yes. Do you mean to say you don't do it in England?"

"Not often. Is it young ladies who drive by moonlight in America?"

"Well, you don't suppose they go alone, do you?" quite ironically. "Of course they have some one with them."

"Ah! Their papas?"

"No."

"Their mammas?"

"No."

"Their governesses, their uncles, their aunts?"

"No," with a little smile.

He smiled also.

"That is another good idea," he said. "You have a great many nice ideas in America."

She was silent a moment or so, swinging her fan slowly to and fro by its ribbon, and appearing to reflect.

"Does that mean," she said, at length, "that it wouldn't be considered proper in England?"

"I hope you won't hold me responsible for English fallacies," was his sole answer.

"I don't hold anybody responsible for them," she returned, with some spirit. "I don't care one thing about them."

"That is fortunate," he commented. "I am happy to say I don't, either. I take the liberty of pleasing myself. I find it pays best."

"Perhaps," she said, returning to the charge, "perhaps Lady Theobald will think this is improper."

He put his hand up and stroked his moustache lightly, without replying.

"But it is not," she added, emphatically; "it is not!"

"No," he admitted, with a touch of irony, "it is not."

"Are you any the worse for it?" she demanded.

"Well, really, I think not—as yet," he replied.

"Then we won't go in," she said, the smile returning to her lips again.

CHAPTER XII.

AN INVITATION.

In the meantime, Mr. Burmistone was improving his opportunities within doors. He had listened to the music with the most serious attention, and on its conclusion he had turned to Mrs. Burnham, and made himself very agreeable indeed. At length, however, he arose and sauntered across the room to a table at which Lucia Gaston chanced to be standing alone, having just been deserted by a young lady whose mamma had summoned her. She wore, Mr. Burmistone regretted to see as he advanced, a troubled and anxious expression—the truth being that she had a moment before remarked the exit of Miss Belinda's niece and her companion. It happened oddly that Mr. Burmistone's first words touched upon the subject of her thought. He began quite abruptly with it:

"It seems to me," he said, "that Miss Octavia Bassett———"

Lucia stopped him with a courage which surprised herself.

"Oh, if you please," she implored, "don't say anything unkind apout her!"

Mr. Burmistone looked down in her soft eyes with a good deal of feeling.

"I was not going to say anything unkind," he answered. "Why should I?"

"Everbody seems to find a reason for speaking severly of her," Lucy faltered. "I have heard so many unkind things to-night, that I am quite unhappy. I am sure—I am sure she is very candid and simple."

"Yes," answered Mr. Brimstone, "I am sure she is very candid and simple."

"Why should we expect her to be exactly like ourselves?" Lucia went on. "How can we be sure that our way is better than any other? Why should they be angry because her dress is so expensive and pretty? Indeed, I only wish I had such a dress. It is a thousand times prettier than any we ever wear. Look around the room, and see if it is not. And as to her not having learned to play on the piano or to speak French—why should she be obliged to do things she feels she would not be clever at? I am not clever, and have been a sort of slave all my life, and have been scolded and blamed for what I could not help at all, until I have felt as if I must be a criminal. How happy she must have been to be let alone!"

She had clasped her little hands, and though she spoke in a low voice, was quite impassioned in an unconscious way. Her brief girlish life had not been a very happy one, as may be easily imagined, and a glimpse of the liberty for which she had suffered roused her to a sense of her own wrongs.

"We are all cut out after the same pattern," she said. "We learn the same things, and wear the same dresses, one might say. What Lydia Egerton has been taught, I have been taught; and yet what two creatures could be more unlike each other, by nature, than we are?"

Mr. Burmistone glanced across the room at Miss Egerton. She was a fine robust young woman, with a high nose and a stolid expression of countenance.

"That is true," he remarked.

"We are afraid of everything," said Lucia, bitterly, "Lydia Egerton is afraid

"don't,

for pity's sake!"

He could not have hit upon a luckier speech, and also he could not have uttered it more feelingly than he did. It helped her to recover herself, and gave her courage.

"There," she said with a slight catch of the breath, "does not that prove what I said to be true! I was afraid, the very moment I ceased to forget myself. I was afraid of you and myself. I have no courage at all."

"You will gain it in time," he said.

"I shall try to gain it," she answered. "I am nearly twenty, and it is time that I should learn to respect myself. I think it must be because I have no self-respect that I am such a coward."

It seemed that her resolution was to be tried immediately; for at that very moment Lady Theobald turned, and, recognizing the full significance of Lucia's position, was apparently struck temporarily dumb and motionless. When she recovered from the shock, she made a majestic gesture of command.

Mr. Burmistone glanced at the girl's face, and saw that it changed color a little. "Lady Theobald appears to wish to speak to you," he said.

Lucia left her seat, and walked across the room with a steady air. Lady Theobald did not remove her eye from her until she stopped within three feet of her. Then she asked a rather unnecessary question.

"With whom have you been conversing?"

"With Mr. Burmistone."

"Upon what subject?"

"We are speaking of Miss Octavia Bassett."

Her ladyship glanced around the room, as if a new idea had occurred to her and said:

"Where is Miss Octavia Bassett?"

Here it must be confessed that Lucia faltered.

"She is on the terrace with Mr. Barold."

"She is on——"

Her ladyship stopped short in the middle of her sentence. This was too much for her. She left Lucia, and crossed the room to Miss Belinda.

"Belinda," she said, in an awful undertone, "your neice is out upon the terrace with Mr. Barold. Perhaps it would be as well for you to intimate to her that in England it is not customary—that—Belinda, go and bring her in."

Miss Belinda arose, actually looking pale. She had been making such strenuous effort to converse with Miss Pilcher and Mrs. Burnham that she had been betrayed into forgetting her charge. She could scarcely believe her ears. She went to the open window and looked out, and then turned paler than before.

"Octavia, my dear," she said, faintly.

"Francis!" said Lady Theobald, over her shoulder.

Mr. Francis Barold turned a rather bored countenance towards them—but it was evidently not Octavia who had bored him.

"Octavia," said Miss Belinda, "how imprudent! In that thin dress—the night air! How could you, my dear, how could you?"

"Oh! I shall not catch cold," Octavia answered. "I am used to it. I have been out hours and hours, on moonlight nights, at home."

But she moved towards them.

"You must remember," said Lady Theobald, "that there are many things which may be done in America which would not be safe in England."

And she made the remark in an almost sepulchral tone of warning.

How Miss Belinda would have supported herself if the coach have not been announced at this juncture, it would be difficult to say. The coach was announced, and they took their departure. Mr. Barold happening to make his adieus at the same time, they were escorted by him down to the vehicle from the Blue Lion.

When he had assisted them in and closed the door, Octavia bent forward so that the moonlight fell full on her pretty, lace-covered head and the sparkling drops in her ears.

"Oh!" she exclaimed, "if you stay here at all, you must come and see us. Aunt Belinda, ask him to come and see us."

Miss Belinda could scarcely speak.

"I shall be most—most happy," she fluttered, "Any—friend of dear Lady Theobald's, of course——"

"Don't forget," said Octavia, waving her hand.

The coach moved off, and Miss Belinda sank back into a dark corner.

"My dear," she gasped, "what will he think?"

Octavia was winding her lace scarf around her throat.

"He'll think I want him to call," she said, serenely. "And I do."

CHAPTER XIII.

INTENTIONS.

The position in which Lady Theobald found herself placed, after these occurrences, was certainly a difficult and unpleasant one. It was Mr. Francis Barold's caprice, for the time being, to develop an intimacy with Mr. Burmistone. He had, it seemed, chosen to become interested in him during their sojourn at Broadoaks. He had discovered him to be a desirable companion, and a clever, amiable fellow. This much he condescended to explain incidentally to her ladyship's self.

"I can't say I expected to meet a nice fellow or companionable fellow," he remarked, "and I was agreeably surprised to find him both. Never says too much or too little. Never bores a man."

To this Lady Theobald could make no reply. Singularly enough, she had discovered early in her acquaintance that her wonted weapons were likely to dull their edges upon the steely coldness of Mr. Francis Barold's impassibility. In the presence of this fortunate young man, before whom his world had bowed the knee from his tenderest infancy, she lost the majesty of her demeanor. He refused to be affected by it; he was even implacable enough to show openly that it bored him, and to insinuate by his manner that he did not intend to submit to it. He entirely ignored the claim of relationship, and acted according to the promptings of his own moods. He did not feel it at all incumbent upon him to remain at Oldclough Hall, and subject himself to the time-honored customs there in vogue. He preferred to accept Mr. Burmistone's invitation to become his guest at the handsome house he had just completed, in which he lived in bachelor splendor. Accordingly he installed himself there, and thereby complicated matters greatly.

Slowbridge found itself in a position as difficult and far more delicate, than Lady Theobald's. The tea-drinkings in honor of that troublesome young person, Miss Octavia Bassett, having been inaugurated by her ladyship, must go the social rounds, according to ancient custom. But what, in discretion's name, was to be done concering Mr. Francis Barold? There was no doubt whatever that he must not be ignored; and, in that case, what difficulties presented themselves!

The mamma of the two Misses Egerton, who was a nervous and easily subjugated person, was so excited and overwrought by the prospects before her that, in contemplating it when she wrote her invitations, she was affected to tears.

"I can assure you, Lydia," she said, "that I have not slept for three nights, I have been so harrassed. Here on one hand, is Mr. Francis Barold, who must be invited, and on the other hand is Mr. Burmistone whom we cannot pass over, and here is Lady Theobald, who will turn to stone the moment she sees him—though, goodness knows, I am sure he seems a very quiet, respectable man, and said some of the most complimentary things about your playing. And here is that dreadful girl, who is enough to give one cold chills, and who may do all sorts of dreadful things, and is certainly a living example to all respectable, well educated girls. And the blindest of the blind could see that nothing would offend Lady Theobald more fatally than to let her be thrown with Francis Barold: and how one is to invite them into the same room, and keep them apart, I'm sure I don't know. Lady Theobald herself could not do it, and how can we be expected to? And the refreshments on my mind, too, and Forbes failing on her tea-cakes, and bringing up Sally Lunns like lead."

That these misgivings were equally shared by each entertainer in prospective might be addduced from the fact that the same afternoon Mrs. Burnham and Miss Pilcher appeared upon the scene, to consult with Mrs. Egerton upon the subject.

Miss Lydia and Miss Violet being dismissed upstairs to their practising, the three ladies sat in the darkened parlor, and talked the matter over in solemn conclave.

"I have consulted Miss Pilcher, and mentioned the affair to Mrs. Gibson," announced Mrs. Burnham. "And really we have not yet been able to arrive at any conclusion."

Mrs. Egerton shook her head, tearfully.

"Pray don't come to me, my dears," she said,—"don't, I beg of you! I have thought about it until my circulation has all gone wrong, and Lydia has been applying hot-water bottles to my feet all morning. I gave it up at half-past two, and set Violet to writing invitations to one and all, let the consequences be what they may."

Miss Pilcher glanced at Mrs. Burnham, and Mrs. Burnham glanced at Miss Pilcher.

"Perhaps," Miss Pilcher suggested to her companion, "it would be as well for you to mention your impressions."

Mrs. Burnham's manner became additionally cautious. She bent forward slightly.

"My dear," she said, "has it struck you that Lady Theobald has any—intentions, so to speak?"

"Intentions!" repeated Mrs. Egerton.

"Yes," with deep significance. "So to speak. With regard to Lucia."

Mrs. Egerton looked utterly helpless

"Dear me!" she ejaculated, plaintively. "I have never had time to think of it. Dear me! With regard to Lucia!"

Mrs. Burnham became more significant still.

"And," she added, "Mr. Francis Barold."

Mrs. Egerton turned to Miss Pilcher, and saw confirmation of the fact in her countenance.

"Dear, dear!" she said. "That makes it worse than ever."

"It is certain," put in Miss Pilcher, "that the union would be a desirable one, and we have reason to remark that a deep interest in Mr. Francis Barold has been shown by Lady Theobald. He has been invited to make her house his home during his stay in Slowbridge, and though he has not done so, the fact that he has not is due only to some inexplicable reluctance upon his own part. And we all remember that Lady Theobald once plainly intimated that she anticipated Lucia forming, in the future, a matrimonial alliance."

"Oh!" commented Mrs. Egerton, with some slight impatience, "it is all very well for Lady Theobald to have intentions for Lucia; but if the young man has none, I really don't that her intentions will be likely to result in anything particular. And I am sure Mr. Francis Barold is not in the mood to be influnced in that way now. He is more likely to entertain himself with Miss Octavia Bassett, who will take him out in the moonlight, and make herself agreeable to him in her American style."

Miss Pilcher and Mrs. Burnham exchanged glances again.

"My dear," said Mrs. Burnham, "he has called upon her twice since Lady Theobald's tea. They say she invites him herself, and flirts with him openly in the garden."

"Her conduct is such," said Miss Pilcher, with a shudder, "that the blinds upon th side of the seminary which faces Miss Bassett's garden are kept closed by my orders. I have young ladies under my care whose characters are in process of formation, and whose parents repose confidence in me."

"Nothing but my friendship for Belinda Bassett," remarked Mrs. Burnham, "would induce me to invite the girl to my house." Then she turned to Mrs. Egerton. "But—ahem—have you included them all in your invitation?" she observed.

Mrs. Egerton became plaintive again.

"I don't see how I could be expected to do anything else," she said. "Lady Theobald herself could not invite Mr. Francis Barold from Mr. Burmistone's house, and leave Mr. Burmistone at home. And after all, I must say it is my opinion nobody would have objected to Mr. Burmistone, in the first place, if Lady Theobald had not insisted upon it."

Mrs. Burnham reflected.

"Perhaps that is true," she admitted cautiously, at length. "And it must be confessed that a man in his position is not entirely without his advantages—particularly in a place where there are but few gentlemen, and those scarcely desirable as——"

She paused there, discreetly; but Mrs. Egerton was not so discreet.

"There are a great many young ladies in Slowbridge," she said, shaking her head. A great many! And with five in a family, all old enough to be out of a school, I am sure it is flying in the face of Providence to neglect one's opportunities."

When the two ladies took their departure, Mrs. Burnham seemed reflective. Finally she said:

"Poor Mrs. Egerton's mind is not what it was—and it never was remarkably strong. It must be admitted, too, that there is a lack of—of delicacy. Those great, plain girls of hers must be a trial to her."

As she spoke they were passing the privet hedge which surrounded Miss Bassett's house and garden; and a sound caused both to glance around. The front door had just been opened, and a gentlemen in neat clerical garb, his guileless ecclesiastical countenance suffused with mantling blushes of confusion and delight. He stopped on the gravel path to receive the last words of Miss Octavia Bassett, who stood on the threshold, smiling down upon him in the prettiest way in the world.

"Tuesday afternoon," she said. "Now don't forget, because I shall ask Mr. Barold and Miss Gaston, on purpose to play against us. Even St. James can't object to croquet."

"I—indeed I shall be most happy and—and delighted," stammered her departing guest, "if you will be so kind as to—to instruct me, and forgive my awkwardness."

"Oh! I'll instruct you," said Octavia. "I have instructed people before, and I know how."

Mrs. Burnham clutched Miss Pilcher's arm.

"Do you see who that is?" she demanded. "Would you have believed it?"

Miss Pilcher preserved a stony demeanor.

"I would believe anything of Miss Octavia Bassett," she replied, "There would be nothing at all remarkable to my mind in her flirting with the Bishop himself? Why should she hesitate to endeavour to entagle the curate of St. James?"

CHAPTER XIV.

A CLERICAL VISIT.

It was indeed true that the Rev. Arthur Poppleton had spent the greater part of his afternoon in Miss Octavia Bassett's front parlor, and that Octavia had entertained him in such a manner that he had been beguiled into forgetting his clerical visits he had intendid to make, and finally committed himself by a promise to return a day or two later to play croquet. His object in calling had been to request Miss Belinda's assistance in a parochial matter. His natural timorousness of nature had indeed led him to put off making the visit for as long a time as possible. The reports he had heard of Miss Octavia Bassett had inspired him with great dread. Consequently he had presented himself at Miss Belinda's front door with secret anguish.

"Will you say," he had faltered to Mary Anne, "that it is Mr. Poppleton, to see Miss Bassett—Miss Belinda Bassett?"

And then he had been handed into the parlor, the door had closed behind him, and he found himself shut up entirely alone in the room with Miss Octavia Bassett herself.

His first impulse was to turn, and flee precipitately; indeed, he even went so far as to turn, and clutch the handle of the door; but somehow, a second thought arrived in time to lead him to control himself.

This second thought came with his second glance at Octavia.

THE CHINESE MAIDEN.

Her skin was the color of saffron tea,
And her nose was as flat as flat could be,
And never were seen such beautiful eyes—
Two almond kernels in shape and size,
Set in a couple of slanting gashes
And not in the least disfigured by lashes.
An then such feet
You'd hardly meet
In the longest walk through the grandest street!
You might go seeking
From Naukin to Pekin
A pair so remarkably small and neat.

CURRENT TOPICS.

Some idea of the magnitude of the four new States may be had when it is stated that their area is about equal to that of all New England, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, Ohio, Kentucky and Indiana combined, and about three times as great as the British Isles.

More than half of the $2,000,000 subscribed on behalf of the Johnstown sufferers is still in the hands of the State Flood Relief Commission, and its members are at this late day discussing how best to distribute the fund while the people are suffering for the lack of the common necessaries of life. This Commission might easily take the first prize for incompetency at any township fair.

The total population of Spanish America including the West Indies and Brazil, is nearly equal to that of the United States being over 50,000,000, of whom not less than 5 per cent. are European subjects and not over 3,000 natives of the United States. There are about 500,000 savage Indians, confined to the interior of the continent of South America, and a few small tribes in Central America, numbering not more than 5,000 all told. Thus nearly every inhabitant of the two continents of Central and South America and the Antilles is a contributor, directly or indirectly, to the exports of the country in which he lives, and to a degree a consumer of imported merchandise.

Obscure and seemingly unimportant paragraphs and cablegrams are frequently finding their way into public print that in Crete the Christians are being persecuted by the unspeakable Turk. Particulars are seldom given, but it is known that horrible atrocities are from time to time perpetrated upon the unhappy people. To-day's cable contains the statement that further outrages have been committed. It is a queer commentary upon the boasted civilization of the 19th century that the European powers should quietly stand by while the cries of the people are so loud and despairing. Would that one-tenth the energy displayed in this country by Christian people in defaming one another were diverted to the succor of their brethren of Crete.

The Maritime Congress which is to open its sessions in Washington on the 16th inst., although lost sight of by the public in the commotion caused by the assembling of the Pan-American Congress, is one of great importance and more than likely will result in more practical benefit to the world than the other. The principal subjects for discussion will be: Marine signals in heavy weather and at night; restriction of draught for loaded vessels—a subject insisted upon by Great Britain, where such a restriction already prevails; the designation and marking of vessels; life-saving appliances and methods; qualifications for officers and seamen; lanes for ocean steamers on frequented routes; storm warnings; reporting and moving of wrecks and obstructions of navigation; uniformity in the system of buoys and beacons, and the establishment of a permanent international maritime commission. The Congress might also, if possible, adopt some means to stop the racing of the Atlantic liners across the ocean. They have already received warning of its dangers, but something more than warning is needed if calamity would be prevented.

A Good Samaritan.

I said, "Where are you going, Mr.——?" He said, "You know my old friend, Mr.——, in Hamilton." I said "yes." "Well," he said, "he has been sick for a long time, and had to put a mortgage on his place last fall, thinking he would be well enough to pay it off by the time it came due. Poor fellow, he is about dead, and the mortgage due, and if the place is sold the family will be turned out of doors. I just thought I would run down this morning and cheer him up a little as he was leaving, that I would pay up that mortgage so he would know that his family would be comfortable when he was gone." He continued, "Our folks are building a big church and they wanted me awful bad to give them a big subscription; but I thought I could do the Master's work better in this way. I suppose they would be disappointed." And with that he left me for we were at Hamilton. "Well, I said to myself again, after he left, "that is a good man. I wish we had more like him. Still, he hasn't much of an eye to business, for it's a poor way to advertise. If he had given the money to the church he might have had his name in every paper from one end of Canada to the other and just what business he was carrying on and what an awful good man he was."—"Tramp" in the Woodstock Sentinel-Review.

Even the old-time suggestion of compelling railroad directors to ride on the cow-catcher of a locomotive, in order that their presence might insure the exercise of greater care by the train hands, would hardly avail in these days of recklessness and blundering. In the case of two recent accidents prominent railroad officials were among the passengers; and in one case their private car formed part of the equipment of the train. Evidently some more heroic remedy will have to be applied.

THE ABUSE OF ENGLISH.

An Occupation in Which More Than Press Writers Engage.

THE STUDY OF LITERARY STYLE.

Authors for Students' Reading—Examples of Everyday Errors.

Authors and tutors occasionally indulge in criticism of what they are pleased to call "Newspaper English," having reference, of course, to the frequency with which writers for the daily press furnish examples of etymological and syntactical errors, and none will more promptly and penitently cry peccavi than the writer for the daily press, whose manuscript is frequently prepared under circumstances and conditions which render any near approach to perfection impossible, and which subordinate elegance of style and etymological exactness to rapidity and brevity. But admitting all that is charged against the work of the writers for the daily press, can it be said that their censors are as a rule faultless and worthy exemplars? Is the English of the average novelist or magazine writer, who with ample leisure prepares his copy and revises and re-revises his proofs, so perfect as to be invulnerable to critical assaults? Are even our standard English classics so free from gross blunders as to elevate their authors to a plane of literary infallibility? Few who have studied them carefully will make such a claim.

FEW MASTERS OF ENGLISH.

With all our boasted educational facilities we have few masters of English composition and literary style. A French writer, quoted by Colton, has said truly: "To acquire a few tongues is the task of a few years; but to be eloquent in one is the labor of a life." Only a few years of the average man's life can, in the nature of things, be devoted to school, and when his efforts and energies are divided up and, as in too many cases, frittered away in acquiring a smattering of two or three other languages, it is scarcely to be wondered why our youths have such a superficial acquaintance with their mother tongue. But that study need not and should not come to a period with our school days. It should continue through life. The critical habit should be encouraged and cultivated. Our reading should be thoughtfully done, even if we do less of it. The great lack of the age is lack of thought. We may read omniverously without deriving much benefit therefrom; it is what we comprehend analytically, what we assimilate, that benefits us. Perhaps if we read less and thought more we would be a wiser people.

THE ACQUISITION OF LITERARY STYLE.

Literary style is an acquired art, and acquirable only in a high degree where there is a natural aptitude. But the worst of literary style may be improved by a course of thoughtful reading of the best authors. No young man or woman can fail to derive benefit from devoting his or her winter evenings to a careful and thoughtful study of Mr. Herbert Spencer's "Literary Style," Mathews' "Words, Their Use and Abuse," Trench "On the Study of Words," and kindred works, supplemented by the reading of a few good English classics. If the object of acquiring the facility of putting similar thoughts into similarly elegant sentences be kept in view the author's style will in a greater or less degree become that of the student. Would you familiarize yourself with elaborate and exhaustive sentences, whose propositions are each a rapier of logical attack and defence, and whose central idea is as a fortified city? Read Locke. Would you cultivate the sledge-hammer style in which the pent-up feelings find utterance in spasmodic and ejaculatory phrases overflowing with soul and energy? Read the works of that prince of iconoclastic invective and detester of shams and pretences, Carlyle. Would you cultivate the expression of great thoughts in few and unimposing words yet with the pathos and power which thrills and conquers? Read Shakespeare, Burns, Martin Tupper. Do you admire smooth, incisive, epigrammatic sentences in which each word is a thought and each indispensable? Read Emerson. Are you an admirer of that perspicuity of style, syntactical arrangement of words and grouping of thoughts which give point to wit and polish and force to argument? Read Spencer, Whately, Paley, Huxley, Max Muller, Burke, Mill, Newton. Do you love narrative? Read the histories of Knight, Macaulay, Hume, Guizot, Green, Parkman, Bancrofs. And in your reading pass no word of the significance of which in the relation in which it is employed you are doubtful. Mark the power which a discriminating use of language gives an author. Test words by the substitution of what you may have supposed to be synomyms; reconstruct the sentences and note the gain or loss of power and point, and you will not fail to discover that in the vast majority of cases there is always one best and most expressive word, one most pungent and effective style.

THE PRESS AND ITS CRITICS.

The errors common to writers for the daily press are not in any sense peculiar to them. Indeed if the contributions of many of their censors were published without the kind supervision of editor and proofreader their authors' title to models of etymological and syntactical perfection would not be worth five minutes' purchase, while such trivial matters as punctuation, capitalization and paragraphing would seem to have been altogether too insignificant to engage their attention. It has fallen to my lot to handle a good deal of copy from severe and caustic critics of "newspaper English," and little of it there was that did not run deeply in debt to editorial Good Samaritanism.

But while literary style cannot be acquired save by careful and continued study and practice, there are many common errors in the use of words which might be corrected without the expenditure of much effort. They are in many cases the result of unconscious imitation; in some they arise from a misunderstanding of certain words misapplied. In almost every case to direct the attention of the writer to the error is to correct it; to fix the signification of the word in his mind is to prevent its repetition.

EXAMPLES OF COMMON ERRORS.

Words like "either," "neither," "betwixt," "between," "whether," "alternative," etc., are frequently misused. Many writers lose sight of the fact that they are applicable only in speaking of two subjects. "Either of the three" would be grossly incorrect, but not more so than to speak of "a race between three horses,' or "a battle betwixt five swordsmen," or "three alternatives." "Between" applies properly to only two parties, while "among" denotes a mass or collection of things and always supposes more than two. You do not divide an apple "among" two persons, but "between" them; prize money is not divided "between" a crew but "among" them. "Either" and "neither" also apply only to one of two things or groups, yet frequently both in speaking and writing they are misused. In their pronunciation, too, these words give rise to differences of opinion, although of "either" Webster says, "Analogy, as well as the best and most general usage is decidedly in favor of ether." "Alternative" denotes a choice restricted to one of two things, yet some are guilty of the literary offence of referring to three proposed lines of action as "three alternatives"! Perhaps no word in the language is more indiscriminately used and abused than "splendid." I meet with it everywhere. It is a "splendid" day; the speaker was "splendid"; the wine at the banquet was "splendid"; he is in "splendid" health; I hear of "splendid" piano playing, a lady in "splendid" voice, a "splendid" menu, a "splendid" horse race, and a ball fielder who makes "splendid" catches. "Splendid" is a good word, appropriate and expressive in certain relations, but there is a limit to its applicability which is very frequently exceeded. "Mutual" is another much abused word, even by writers like Pope and Dickens. It is in meaning "reciprocal," and implies an interchange of the thing referred to; hence it is quite proper to speak of "mutual" friendship, whereas "our mutual friend" is a palpable absurdity which even the authority of Dickens cannot justify. "Partially," which is properly the opposite of "impartially," is now frequently employed where "partly" is meant, and in such sense has obtained a measure of recognition; but there is no excuse for its substitution for "partly" as expressive of in part, in some measure or degree. Some highflying writers, too, never allow a person to eat his dinner; he must "partake" of it; and it matters not whether he eats as one of a company or alone, whether he takes part of what is set before him or clears the table, they make him "partake" just the same, regardless of the plain meaning of the words. I have a suspicion that "partaker" is also responsible for the "salesladies" and "salesgents" who wait on "persons" who go shopping.

"Apparent" is another word that is much abused. It is often employed when the context leaves no doubt that "obvious" or "evident" as opposed to "seeming" was meant. "Evidence," too, is used where "testimony" should be the word chosen, and many persons speak of being "aggravated" when they are simply "irritated," an error, of course, unless their normal condition was bad. To "aggravate" is to make worse or less tolerable. "Restive" is frequently used when it is desired to express the very opposite condition and when "restless" should be employed. "Less" is very commonly, but erroneously, substituted for "fewer," and vice versa; and "quantity" and "number" are confounded. To speak of property "appreciating" in value is to use an Americanism, but one which has now obtained general currency. "Anticipate" is sometimes erroneously used as a synonym for "expect" or "hope." It means "to take beforehand," and indicates a foretasting, foreseeing, taking into the mind a conception of the future. Although interchangeable in some situations it is not synonymous with "expect," which is generally the stronger word. "Plead" for "pleaded" is in inexcusably bad taste. "Full complement" is a common tautological blunder and is equivalent to saying a "round circle,' a "three cornered triangle."

THE BEST WRITERS ERR.

"But that" and "but what" used for "that" are found in the works of writers of some note. Even Trench says: He never doubts but that he knows their intention." The "but" is just as useless as the buttons on the back of the waist of a man's coat, and much less ornamental. "I have got" so and so is a common expression and in nine out of ten cases the "got" is a superfluity. "Further" and "farther" are often misused. It should be borne in mind that if you cannot follow a friend "further" in an argument you may be able to see him "farther" on his journey homeward. A like discrimination is to be observed in the use of the word "differ." I may "differ with" my friend on a matter of opinion, yet "differ from" him in complexion, stature, etc., with perfect propriety. "A couple of weeks ago," is neither as good English nor as brief as "two weeks ago." Do not say "a year since" when you mean "a year ago." "View of" and "view to" are frequently misplaced. I may obtain an excellent "view of" the city from the mountain top, yet I may climb the steep with a "view to" enjoying the fresh air and exercise. "Should" and "would" demand more space than can here be devoted to them. The "ought" idea attaches to the former and that of determination, volition, desire, to the latter. Do not use "stop" when you mean "stay," or "stopping" for "staying," "except" for "unless," or "folks" when you mean "folk." Distinguish between words expressive of actions or causes and effects or consequences. The man who writing of a case of suicide by morphia said: "The somnolent effects of the narcotic became early apparent," probably meant to refer to the soporific effects of the drug producing somnolence. But he was beyond his depth. Do not use the word "whole" when you mean "all," and do not say a speaker "alluded" to some subject to which he referred directly and at length.

The field is large, and I might multiply examples of common errors in the use of words and write volumes on literary style. The study is one that will amply recompense the student, and none who aspire to success in any literary pursuit can afford to neglect it. Max Muller says: "Language and thought are inseparable. To think is to speak low; to speak is to think aloud. The word is the thought incarnate." Coke says: "Syllables govern the world." Southey says: "It is with words as with sunbeams—the more they are condensed the deeper they burn." Locke says: "If a gentleman be to study language at all it should be that of his own country." In these days of colloquialisms, slang and literary rubbish, no more profitable study than that of literary style, the expression of thought concisely and incisively in pure English, the subtle distinctions in words, can be recommended to young people.

Tall Chimneys.

The tallest chimney in the United States though, is claimed by Kearney, near Newark, N. J., it being 335 feet high, 28 feet in diameter at the base, and containing not less than 1,697,000 bricks A writer in the Boston Globe states, however, that enormous as some of the American smoke shafts are, they are but pigmies beside those in the "Old Country." Scotch and English chimneys, it seems, are famous for their cloud reaching peculiarities. At the Dobson & Barlow mills, Bolton, England, there is an octagon stack, 369½ feet in height and over 33 feet in diameter at the base. Glasgow, Scotland, is famous for its tall chimneys. Tennant & Co. have one which runs up 455½ feet, with a base of thirty feet, while the great Townshend stack, in the same city, towers 468 feet into the air from the foundation, with a big base measuring 32 feet in diameter. This is generally spoken of as the tallest chimney in the world, although the men of Paisley declare that they have one 500 feet high. In Halifax, England, there is an octagon tower rising 381 feet, with a base of 30 feet, and weighing 10,000 tons. In Bradford there is a stone shaft rising 300 feet above the ground, being nine feet at the summit. At the shell foundry of Woolwich Arsenal there is a chimney 223 feet above the ground and 16 feet below it, with a Portland stone cap weighing seventeen tons. The West Cumberland Iron Works have one 251 feet high, and at the Dundee Linen Works there is one rising 282 feet from the ground. At the Edinburgh gas works there is one rising 341 feet into the air, and Haddersfield has a circular shaft of 321 feet. In France the tallest smokestacks are built of iron, the most notable being two at the Creusot works, one being 197 feet high, and the other 279 feet. Liverpool, too, has one cloud toucher in the shape of a chimney at Musprat's works 406 feet high.

Taken by themselves, these altitudes do not perhaps, convey any very striking ideal to the reader, but when placed in comparison with the height of other structures it will be seen that they rank among the highest constructions of the world.

An Anglo-Saxon South.

The New Orleans Times-Democrat corrects a statement in the Record ascribing a Latin origin to a majority of the white people in the Southern States, and with some asperity professes its astonishment that "a paper of the standing of the Record should be so far off." By way of comment the Times-Democrat makes some interesting observations which are worth reprinting. It says: There is some French blood in Louisiana and some little Latin blood in South Carolina, Florida and Texas, but, with the exception of Louisiana, this Latin element forms an infinitesimal portion of the white population. New England with its large French Canadian population, is infinitely more Latin to-day than any Southern State, with this single exception. As a matter of fact the South is now the most Anglo-Saxon portion of the country, the English element being infinitely larger in Virginia, the two Carolinas and Georgia, than anywhere north of the line, where the large immigration of late years has completely changed the character of the population. New England, originally nearly pure English has altogether changed in the last forty years. To-day Boston is essentially an Irish city, while the French Canadian influence already predominates in many manufacturing towns, and is growing stronger. Only a short time ago one of the most prominent New Englanders traveling in the South, was somewhat surprised to find the people so purely Anglo Saxon in race, and came rightly to the conclusion that the original Americans, the descendants of the men who founded and established this Republic, were to be found to-day unmixed with any other race in this portion of the country.—Philadelphia Record.

Speaking before a meeting of Methodist ministers, Bishop Fowler told of a new heathen temple in the northern part of Japan. It was of enormous size, and the timbers for the temple from their mountain homes were hauled up to the temple and put in place by ropes made from the hair of the women of the province. An edict went forth calling for the long hair of the women of the province, and two ropes were made from these tresses—one 17 inches in circumference and 1,400 feet long, and the other 10 to 11 inches around and 2,600 feet long.

Spurgeon, the eminent Baptist preacher, never makes any preparation for a sermon. It is his habit to choose some text Saturday evening to be used on the morrow. Thirty minutes, and no longer, he devotes to looking up references. On these references he jots down a few notes, and with nothing else at hand he steps into his pulpit on Sunday morning without manuscript or thought of his text other than that given it during the half-hour's study of the previous evening.

ARE BLINKERS HURTFUL?

Reasons Why They Harm Instead of Benefit Horses That Wear Them.

When a horse is used for the saddle no one thinks of meddling with his eyes, and we allow the animal to use them freely, as nature has directed. But no sooner do we put the same animal into harness than we think ourselves bound to fasten a black leather flap over each of his eyes, so as to prevent him from seeing objects at his sides, and to limit his view to those which are in his immediate front. This is done with the very best intentions, the object being to save him from being frightened by startling and unwonted sights, and only to leave a sufficiency of vision wherewith to guide his steps. Herein, as in feeding and stabling the horse, man judges the animal by himself, forgetting, or rather having failed to notice, that the eyes of the horse are exceedingly unlike our own. Our eyes are set in the front of our heads, so that if blinkers were fastened to our temples our range of vision would be but slightly limited. But the eyes of the horse are placed on the sides of the head, and are rather prominent, so that the animal cannot only see on either side, but by rolling his eyes backwards, as we see in a vicious horse, can see objects almost in his immediate rear. The effect of the blinker is both physically and mentally injurious to the horse. In the first place, especially when large and brought near the eyes, it has the effect of heating them and hindering the free passage of air over them. In the next place, it causes the eyes to be always directed forward, and thus produces a most injurious strain on the delicate muscles. We know how painful a sensation is felt when we are obliged to strain our eyes either backward or upward any length of time, and the horse suffers no less inconvenience when it is forced to keep its eyes continually strained forward.

The worst example of the blinkers that I have ever seen was in the United States, where the blinkers (or "blinders" as they are there named) are often brought so closely together in front by means of a strap and a buckle that a mere narrow strip barely half an inch in width is left for vision. This again is done with the best intentions, the object being to save the animal from being afflicted with snow blindness. Now the horse's eyes are in many respects different from our own, and are not affected, as is the case with ours, by the vast expanses of dazzling snow which are rendered even more dazzling by the clear atmosphere and brilliant sunshine of America. One of its safeguards lies in the remarkable structure which is properly termed the "haw," and scientifically the "nictitating membrane." This is a sort of a third eyelid set beneath the true eyelids, and capable of being drawn at will over the eyeball, thus performing the double duty of shielding the eye from the direct glare of light and clearing the surface from dust and any other foreign substance. This membrane is seen in perfection in the birds of prey, so that the proverbial statement that the eagle trains itself to gaze at the midday sun has some foundation in fact.—Public Opinion.

The Friendship of Men.

If you want a friend who is beyond the reach of envy, of mistrust, of influence, of all those sordid influences which mar and break the friendly tie, you will not find him in the flesh and blood. I write "him" advisedly, because friendships of the platonic kind, in which the opposite sex forms a party to the contract, are not lasting. If pure friendships, or more specifically, platonic love, were possible it would be a delightful relaxation for the highly [illegible] because it is

A STORM ON THE DESERT.

Wild Scenes on the Great Sahara in Africa.

(New York Mail and Express.)

Under the fairest skies the desert is an awesome solitude, but when a storm comes it is terrible and appalling. I shall never forget a scene I witnessed some forty miles beyond the great pyramids. I had gained an isolated hillock, some 200 feet above the level of the surrounding desert. Away to the west, about two miles distant, I descried six or seven lofty pillars of sand moving swiftly over the undulating plain. The centre one of these was vertical, and those surrounding it at a distance of 200 or 300 yards leaned slightly toward it. The sand at the base of the columns was lashed by the furious whirlwind into a surging sea. Desert trees of the hardest wood were torn up with their roots and hurled hundred of yards away and high up into the air; even the grass that grew in the path of that terrible storm was shorn clear away from its roots. The summits of those columns of sand at length joined and then burst forth from their united tops a yellow gigantic cloud of sand of such magnitude and density as to darken, as in a total eclipse, the face of the bright afternoon sun. The sand spout, called by the natives "zobahah," shortly after subsided, but the cloud of sand and grass, which had been raised high in the heavens, continued to darken the setting sun for more than another hour. The smaller column behind traveled swiftly, increasing in size, until it reached the site of the break up of the other, and then added its mite to the universal destruction.

With my sextant, as I stood in security, I measured the height of the centre column of sand; it was nearly 1,000 feet. The other columns were rising so rapidly that they soon reached a height greater than that of the centre column. When the junction of them all took place the sudden eruption of sand, leaves and grass reached to a total height of over 4,000 feet. These "zobahahs" are not very frequent, but when they occur they carry widespread devastation along with them, and woe betide the traveller and the tent that happen to stand in their way. Not more than ten yards from the column the air is perfectly calm, but within the small circumscribing circle there rages such a tempest as will carry away anything, however firmly fixed in the ground, into the regions of the upper air as easily as an ordinary gust of wind will blow a piece of paper. The camel, this wonderful ship of the desert, always knows a few hours before whether one of those approaching "zobahahs" is likely to come upon him, and his natural instinct will guide him to a place of safety, where he lies down and only breathes the cool, reactive current which closely follows the burning, almost suffocating, hot air which accompanies the "zobahahs." The usual movement of these sand spouts is in the arc of a wide circle, and the direction of the centre of the circle is almost invariably from south to north.

When these awful turmoils are over, and the disturbing elements have resumed their normal state, the burning sand becomes saturated with a heavy dew, the sun is less angry, and the African desert more amenable to life in both men and beasts. Nature's wisdom and wonders are indeed beyond man's limited understanding.

They Need Nerve.

"Engineers at rest, sitting in the narrow cabs of their engines, lying at the depot waiting for the signal to start, often look to be a sleepy set of fellows," said the man the other night who runs the limited to Alliance. "Do you know," he continued, addressing a reporter, "that engineers are always wide awake when they seem to be indifferent to events happening around them? There are few things that escape their vigilant eyes. Many people have an idea that engineers 'go it blind' and trust entirely to the block system and the acuteness of good telegraph operators, but if they did this there would be wrecks and lives lost every day.

'A good engineer is always on the lookout. We see plenty of things ahead of us that harrow our nerves and make the hair stand up straight, but as long as the passengers behind us don't know it, and we all escape uninjured, we heave a sigh of relief and say nothing. I tell you, it is no easy matter to hold a throttle, shoot around sharp curves and watch for obstructions. An engineer looks down for a moment at the connecting rods of the locomotive, moving backward and forward with lightning-like rapidity. He doesn't know at what minute a pin may break and one of the rods knock his brains out as he leans out of the cab.

"We have to make schedule time; the road is full of curves, and we are likely to bang into these trains as we pass them. Little do people know how rasping it is on the nerves to be continually making narrow escapes, and yet one invariably feels that some day he is bound to 'get it in the neck.' It is the uncertainty of the business that is so trying."—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Ettie.

POOL.—Died, at Lady Bank, on Wednesday, Oct. 2, Ettie Pool.

When the harvest moon was shining,
And the autumn winds blew cold;
And a mystic hand was painting,
Forest leaves in shades untold;
Then it was, as nature faded,
That our little Ettie bright,
Droped, then fell, like a sweet blossom,
In the cold grave from our sight.

Drear is life around the mother,
Since her darling baby died;
Empty cradle, little dresses,
Tearfully are laid aside;
For she never more shall need them,
Or her parents' loving care;
Angel forms do now attend her
In the city over there.

Could they but have seen her spirit
As it reached the shining strand,
Heard the joyous song of "Welcome,"
From that glorious angel band.
Ah! methinks they'd cease from weeping
And submissively would say,—
"Blessed be the Lord who giveth Blessed He who takes away."

She will never know the sorrow
Of life's dark and toilsome way
Never feel the heavy burdens
We oft' bear from day to day:
No! she was but sent to cheer us
For a few short months below;
Budded here to bloom in Heaven,
And in richer beauty grow.

Sweetest Ettie! precious blossom!
Though we miss thy form so dear,
Yet we would not wish to call thee
Back to this cold world of care:
But if faithful to the Master,
Till life's closing hour shall come,
We shall meet thee and forever,
Dwell in that celestial home.

The Cambria Critic says:—Editing a newspaper in a country town is at all times a trying occupation, and the utter absence of news about Cambria of late makes it doubly so. But how do our readers expect us out here, 40 miles from a railroad, 10 miles from a steamer landing, 40 miles from a city, millions of miles from heaven, two miles from the devil and only 50 yards from a whiskey shop, to get out a newsy and interesting paper?

A daughter of Mr. Edward Hutton, of the Durham Road, received so severe a cut in the forehead last Friday that Dr. McNamara had to be sent for to stitch up the wound. The damage is said to have been caused by Hutton himself, who threw a stick of firewood at his wife, but missing its mark it struck the child. This is not the first time that he has so conducted himself towards his wife and family. It is tolerably certain that if he persists he will find himself in the cooler ere long. Too much whisky has brought him pretty low.—[Durham Chronicle.

CASH STORE.

We sell everything on strictly cash principles. Are often asked by our customers, why don't you give credit, would sell double the goods? Our answer is, we consider it to the customers' advantage to buy on the CASH SYSTEM even if he has to borrow the money for a short time to do so. In the first place, he knows exactly what he is doing and goes home contented, feeling assured there would be no long bill coming to him with a hundred and one different articles on it which he thinks never came into the house. In the second place, he will be more careful in his purchases and buy only what is most needed, doing without a hundred and one different articles which are useless and extravagant. In the third place, he can buy from ten to fifteen per cent less at a cash house, than any credit house in the Dominion

Our Stock consists of Dry Goods,

"Sydenham."

Owen's Sound—My First Visit There Forty-four Years Ago—Rambling Notes.

BY WM. PURDY.

Who having travelled "all around,"
Yet well remembers Owen's Sound.

as it "looked" in 1845, with an almost unbroken forest on either side from entrance to ending, where "hidden among the thick trees," semi-circularly surrounded by hill and forest, nestled the embryo town and future city, Owen Sound, but then and several years subsequently, called Sydenham, as above. I doubt if there were a score of buildings all told at that time. The "Government house," land agent's office and residence, being the "chief factor," while the Indian village on a "grassy green" on the opposite shore of the placid waters of "Owen's" sound, as called on the map, "lent enchantment to the view."

How varied are the sensations, or opinions, especially of strangers, when first visiting a new locality. Some are pleased, while some, as my old acquaintance said, view it with a

"NOXIOUS EYE."

Quite different was my opinion of that newly rising portion of Canada, to that of my friend "Whang," a somewhat excentric person who had for many years donned the redman's costume, wigwam-ing here and there, wherever the best hunting localities were found.

After a tedious canoeing journey of several hundred miles, (probably previous to 1845) visiting places of interest and non-interest on lake Huron, the Sound included, he remarked to me after returning as follows:

"When I first saw Owen Sound, I put my curse on it!" disgusted. Wonder if he ever went back to see whether his curse "took?" not a bad fellow after all was "Whang."

OUR HORSES MISSING.

My cousin, J. T. Purdy and I "travelled on horseback" to see the Sound at the date I mentioned. We put up for the night at Rutherford's inn. Early the next morning we were informed that our horses were gone! Some "foul fiend" had turned them out of the stable during the night, minus saddle and bridle. We were in a "fix," hundreds of miles from home. No public conveyance of any kind, and much of the way through wilderness and thinly settled country. Our "host"

He then began each tower to search,
Each nook to scan. "In vain" we cried,
"Where dost thou hide my lovely steed"?
For pray, take heed, we cannot ride
A lifeless saddle, tho' willing to
Our own canoe alway "to paddle."
And thus we sighed.

After a time they were found foraging near the "Garafraxa road." When returning them, said the landlord, "I was gladder nor a hundred dollars when I laid my hands on them." "Thussly" were we.

MEMENTO.

I think there was but one store then at the Sound, "presided over" by an elderly couple by the name of "Hinchcliff" from whom I bought a box of percussion caps, price, "seven-pence-ha'penny." No "dollars and cents" then in Canada. It was not of necessity that I made the purchase, but a something to show when I got home—a memento, reminder of Owen Sound, at least so long as all the caps lasted, so "far away" did then seem, but now steamships, railroads and telegraphs have brought it near "everywhere." I also notice that the steam shipbuilding enterprise has been entered upon in Owen Sound, the "Manitoba" having been built there recently. When I first saw the Sound I think nothing greater than a "chemaun," a birch bark canoe, had been constructed there, and that by Indians.

OWEN SOUND

"Tis wondrous strange how great the change."

It is about twenty years since I saw that enterprising town. "By reason of age," long years an invalid, the intervening distance, I never expect to visit there again.

During my sojourn in Meaford from 1848 to 1853, and subsequently, I ever entertained a friendly feeling toward those sound Owen Sounders. The "papers" keep me quite well informed concerning matters pertaining thereto, which I read with interest. And now, Mr. Editor, accept my thanks for (too often formal expression) the "valuable space" given me, and with best wishes

To all the world, that is to Owen Sound,
With a few of the neighboring townships around.

I end these "rambling notes."

Kimberley.

From our own Correspondent.

Kimberley to the fore again.

The Justice of the Peace surprised the natives by walking into town the other day with a Winchester on his shoulder, and rather a doubtful expression on his face as to what kind of reception was in store for him. Of course we were disappointed that he did not succeed in shooting a deer while in Muskoka, but we are so pleased to see his smiling countenance, and feel that we have the stalwart protector of our rights with us again, that we freely forgive him. Since his return he has proved that to him there is no place dearer than home, for he, in company with Mr. Jas. Fawcett and Alex. Carruthers succeeded in bringing down an antlered prize, though we believe Mr Fawcett was the lucky gunner.

Cupid has been using his assegais rather freely lately. Miss Lucy Carruthers has become a victim and is now the wife of Mr. Wm. Walters. Her many friends wish her a happy future.

Rumors are floating on the breeze that several other marriages are to take place shortly. In fact the air has become so impregnated with the marriage craze that it is dangerous to breathe. Miss McCauley has even succeeded in captivating the flour of Kimberley's nobility, and when last seen she was brushing her sleeve. An elopement will be necessary in this case.

Mr. McKenzie is having his blacksmith shop roofed, and Mr. T. Bradbury has purchased Mr. W. T. McConnell's residence and purposes moving to town to ply his (ever) lasting trade, the renewing of soles.

Mr. Thos. Sherwood has moved to his residence on River street, where he will be near his place of business. I tell you we are movers here. VIGILANCE.

Maxwell.

From our own Correspondent.

A special meeting of the directors of the Osprey Ag'l Society was held here last Saturday afternoon to hear complaints made by John Madill, against Hector McDonald, Wm. Guy, Thos. Brownridge, Wm. Kerton and R. Y. Burk. McDonald previously had acknowledged to the President and Secretary that he had entered and taken 1st prize on saddle horse for an animal belonging to Rice Hill. He was fined $1.00 and forfeited the prize awarded him. In the other cases Mr. John Madill disclaimed any knowledge of making the complaints, his brother David having done so over John's signature. Denials from the accused of rather an aromatic flavor were read. The case against R. Y. Burk was withdrawn, and the evidence against the others being of the somebody-told-me-so species, they were dismissed for want of evidence. We hope this investigation will prove a benefit to the society in future.

The Christian Endeav'r.

P'raps you haint hearn o' th' s'ciety they've hitched t' th' churches around,
Without regard to th' crowd, or th' creed, but a view o' th' place where they'r bound?
They don't never pertend t' be Christians, they're only endeav'rin' to be;
But th' way our dominie prays for 'em 's no matter o' wonder to me.
For a town o' sech smallish pretensions, an' a church thet was rather cold,
We'cert'nly got an awakenin' when th' Christian
Endeav'r took hold.

First go they was kinder shame-faced a bit, thet
th' e'ders should cast a frown
On young folks for givin' a supper thet got th'
domini'e's wife a gown;
But th' labelled box they past around froze th'
deakins' blood—cold's an icycle!
'T was "drop a dollar in th' slot an' see th' dominie ride his bi-sickle!"
Th' deakins they tho't it a sackrilledge, but thet
th' young folks couldn't see,
But they didn't pertend t' be Christians, but only endeav'red to be.

Our dominie was a deal worn out, so p'r'aps his sermons wern't all afire.
An' th' young folks 't seems they hed their views on gettin' th' wuth o' his hire.
Th' deakins they tho't thet was uppish in 'em,
an' so they labored with their views,
An' talked o' "years" an' "change o' scene," an'
hinted some o' "disquiet in th' pews!"
But, somehow, th' boxes they gathered th' dollars
'bout everywheres they past;
So th' dominie rides his bisickle, an' says he's a growin' young fast.

They'll fill th' week night meetin's full, an' if th'
speekin's hap'pin' kinder slow,
They don't no single minnit pass w'thout they up and say a verse or so;
An' it spurs th' ol' folks mettle to see th' young folks try
T' carpet halls, an' paint th' walls, an make th' meetin's spry.
An' disclaim their bein' Christians, an' t' say they only endeav'r
T' prove thet creed is in th' deed thet shall teach for the life forever.

For a town o' sech smallish dimensions, an' a church thet felt kinder old,
We cert'nly got an awakenin' when the Christian
Endeav'r took hold;
For th' "billiard hall" hes vanished quite, an'
some I know now go t' th' church
Who wouldn't ha' dreamed how pleasant it seemed to leave th' "saloon" in th' lurch;
An' I've a boy o' twenty or so, who ha'nted the town, tell me
He didn't dare think he'd be Christian, but he'd allays endeav'r t' be.

For a town o' such prudish contention t' parry
th' sight o' sin,
We cert'nly got an awakenin' when the Christian
Endeav'r stepped in.

EDWARD LEODORE SMITH.

AN AMERICAN GIRL.

She was not at all what he had pictured her. Singularly enough, no one had told him that she was pretty, and he had thought of her as a gaunt young person with a determined and manly air. She struck him, on the contrary, as being extremely girlish and charming to look upon. She wore the pale pink gown, and as he entered he saw her give a furtive little dab to her eyes with a lace handkerchief, and hurriedly crushed a open letter into her pocket. Then, seeming to dismiss her emotion with facility, she rose to greet him.

"If you want to see Aunt Belinda," she said, "perhaps you had better sit down. She will be here directly."

He plucked up spirit to take a seat, suddenly feeling his terror take wing. He was amazed at his own courage,

"Th-thank you," he said. "I have the pleasure of——" There, it is true, he stopped, looked at her, blushed, and finished somewhat disjointedly. "Miss Octavia Bassett, I believe."

"Yes," she answered, and sat down near him.

When Miss Belinda descended the stairs, a short time afterwards, her ears were greeted by the sound of a brisk conversation, in which the Rev. Arthur Poppleton appeared to be taking part with before-unheard-of spirit. When he arose at her entrance, there was in his manner an air of mild buoyancy which astonished her beyond measure. When he reseated himself, he seemed quite to forget the object of his visit for some minutes, and was thus placed in the embarrassing position of having to refer to his note-book.

Having done so, and found that he had called to ask assistance for the family of one of his parishoners, he recovered, himself somewhat. As he explained the exigencies of the case, Octavia listened.

"Well," she said, "I should think it would make you quite uncomfortable, if you see things like that often."

"I regret to say that I do see such things only too frequently," he answered.

"Gracious!" she said; but that was all.

He was conscious of being slightly disappointed at her apathy, and perhaps it is to be deplored that he forgot it afterward, when Miss Belinda had bestowed her mite, and the case was dismissed for the time being. He really did forget it, and was beguiled into making a very long call, and enjoying himself as he had never enjoyed himself before.

When, at length, he was recalled to a sense of duty by a glance at the clock, he had already before his eyes an opening vista of delights, taking the form of future calls, and games of croquet played upon Miss Belinda's neatly-shaven grass-plot. He had bidden the ladies adieu in the parlor, and, having stepped into the hall, was fumbling rather excitedly in the umbrella-stand for his own especially slender clerical umbrella, when he was awakened to new rapture by hearing Miss Octavia's tone again.

He turned and saw her standing quite near him looking at him with rather an odd expression and holding something in her hand.

"Oh!" she said. "See here! Those people."

"I—beg pardon," he hesitated. "I don't quite understand.

"Oh, yes!" she answered. "Those desperately poor wretches, you know—with fever, and leaks in their house, and all sorts of disagreeable things the matter with them. Give them this won't you?"

"This" was a pretty silk purse, through whose meshes he saw the gleam of gold coin.

"That?" he said. "You don't mean—isn't there a good deal—I beg pardon—but really——"

"Well, if they are as poor as you say they are, it won't be too much," she replied. "I don't suppose they'll object to it, do you?"

She extended it to him as if she rather wished to get it out of her hands.

"You'd better take it," she said. "I shall spend it on something I don't need, if you don't. I'm always spending money on things I don't care for afterwards"

He was filled with remorse, remembering that he had thought her apathetic.

"I—I really thought you were not interested at all," he burst forth. "Pray forgive me. This is generous indeed."

She looked down at some particularly brilliant rings on her hands, instead of looking at him.

"Oh, well," sh said, "I think it must be simply horrid to have to do without things. I can't see how people live. Besides, I haven't denied myself anything. It would be worth talking about if I had, I suppose. Oh, by the bye, never mind telling any one, will you?"

Then, without giving him time to reply, she raised her eyes to his face, and plunged into the subject of the croquet again, pursuing it until the final moment of his exit and departure, which was when Mrs. Burnham and Miss Pilcher had been scandalized at the easy freedom of her adieus.

CHAPTER XV.

SUPERIOR ADVANTAGES.

When Mr. Francis Barold called to pay his respects to Lady Theobald, after partaking of her hospitality, Mr. Burmistone accompanied him and, upon almost every other occasion of presenting himself to her ladyship, Mr. Burmistone was his companion.

It may as well be explained, at the outset, that the mill-owner of Burmistone Mills was a man of decided determination of character, and that, upon the evening of Lady Theobald's tea, he had arrived at the conclusion that he would spare no effort to gain a certain end he felt it would add to his happiness to accomplish.

"I stand rather in awe of Lady Theobald, as any ordinary man would," he had said, drily, to Barold, on their return to his house. "But my awe of her is not so great yet that I shall allow it to interfere with any of my plans."

"Have you any special plans?" inquired Barold carelessly, after a pause.

"Yes," answered Mr. Burmistone, "several. I should like to go to Oldclough rather often."

"I feel it the civil thing to go to Oldclough oftener than I like. Go with me."

"I should like to be included in all the invitations to tea for the next six months."

"I shall be included in all the invitations so long as I remain here, and it is not likely you will be left out in the cold. After you have gone the rounds once you won't be dropped."

"Upon the whole, it appears so," said Mr. Burmistone. "Thanks."

So, at each of the tea-parties following Lady Theobald's, the two men appeared together. The small end of the wedge being inserted into the social stratum, the rest was not difficult. Mrs. Burnham was at once surprised and overjoyed by her discoveries of the many excellencies of the man they had so hastily determined to ignore. Mrs. Abercrombie found Mr. Burmistone's manner all that could be desired. Miss Pilcher expressed the highest appreciation of his views upon feminine education and "our duty to the young in our charge." Indeed, after Mrs. Egerton's evening, the tide of public opinion turned suddenly in his favor.

Public opinion did not change, however, as far as Octavia was concerned. Having had her anxiety set at rest by several encouraging paternal letters from Nevada, she began to make up her mind to enjoy herself, and was, it is to be regretted, betrayed by her youthful high spirit into the committing of numerous indiscretions. Upon each festal occasion, she appeared in a new and elaborate costume; she accepted the attentions of Mr. Francis Barold as if it was the most natural thing in the world that they should be offered; she joked—in what Mrs. Burnham designated "her Nevada way"—with the Rev. Arthur Poppleton, who appeared more frequently than had been his habit at the bigh teas. She played croquet with that gentlemen and Mr. Barold day after day, upon the grass-plot, before all the eyes gazing down upon her from the neighboring windows; she managed to coerce Mr. Burmistone into joining these innocent orgies; and, in fact, to quote Miss Pilcher, there was "no limit to the shamelessness of her unfeminine conduct."

Several times much comment had been aroused by the fact that Lucia Gaston had been observed to form one of the party of players. She had indeed played with Barold, against Octavia and Mr. Poppleton, on the memorable day upon which that gentlemen had taken his first lesson.

Barold had availed himself of the invitation extended to him by Octavia, upon several occasions, greatly to Miss Belinda's embarrassment. He had dropped in the evening after the curate's first call.

"Is Lady Theobald very fond of you?" Octavia had asked, in the course of this visit,

"It is very kind of her, if she is," he replied, with languid irony.

"Isn't she found enough of you to do anything you ask her?" Octavia inquired.

"Really, I think not," he replied. "Imagine the degree of affection it requires! I am not fond enough of any one to do anything they ask me."

Octavia bestowed a long look upon him.

"Well," she remarked after a pause, "I believe you are not. I shouldn't think so."

Barold colored very faintly.

"I say," he said, "is that an imputation, or something of that character? It sounds like it, you know."

Octavia did not reply directly. She laughed a little.

"I want you to ask Lady Theobald to do something," she said.

"I am afraid I am not in such favor as you imagine," he said, looking slightly annoyed.

"Well, I think she won't refuse you this thing," she went on. "If she didn't loathe me so I would ask her myself."

He deigned to smile.

"Does she loathe you?" he inquired.

"Yes," nodding. "She would not speak to me if it wasn't for Aunt Belinda. She thinks I am fast and loud. Do you think I am fast and loud?"

He was taken aback, and not for the first time, either. She had startled and discomposed him several times in the course of their brief acquaintance, and he always resented it, priding himself in private, as he did, upon his coolness and immobility. He could not think of the right thing to say just now, so he was silent for a second.

"Tell me the truth," she persisted. "I shall not care much."

"I do not think you would care at all."

"Well, perhaps I shouldn't. Go on. Do you think I am fast?"

"I am happy to say I do not find you slow."

She fixed her eyes on him, smiling faintly.

"That means I am fast," she said. "Well, no matter. Will you ask Lady Theobald what I want you to ask her?"

"I should not say you were fast at all," he said, rather stiffly. "You have not been educated as—as Lady Theobald has educated Miss Gaston, for instance."

"I should rather think not," she replied. Then she added, very deliberately: "She has had what you might call very superior advantages, I suppose.'

Her expression was totally incomprehensible to him. She spoke with the utmost seriousness, and looked at the table.

"That is derision, I suppose," he remarked, restively.

She glanced up again.

"At all events," she said, "there is nothing to laugh at in Lucia Gaston. Will you ask Lady Theobald? I want you to ask her to let Lucia Gaston come and play croquet with us on Tuesday. She is to play with you against Mr. Poppleton and me."

"Who is Mr. Poppleton?" he asked with some reserve. He did not exactly fancy sharing his entertainment with any ordinary outsider. After all, there was no knowing what this little American might do.

"He is the curate of the church," she replied, undisturted, "He is very nice, and little, and neat, and blushes all over to the toes of his boots. He came to see Aunt Belinda, and I asked him to come and be taught to play."

"Who is to teach him?"

"I am. I have taught at least twenty men in New York and San Francisco."

"I hope he appreciates your kindness."

"I mean to try if I can make him forget to be frightened," she said, with a gay laugh

It was certainly nettling to find his air of reserve and displeasure met with such inconsequent lightness. She never seemed to recognize the subtle changes of temperature expressed in his manner. Only his sense of what was due to himself prevented his being very chilly indeed, but, as she went on with her gay chat, in utter ignorance of his mood, and indulged in some very pretty airy nonsense, he soon recovered himself, and almost forgot his private grievance.

Before going away, he promised to ask Lady Theobald's indulgence in the matter of Lucia's joining them in their game. One speech of Octavia's connected with the subject he had thought very pretty, as well as kind:

"I like Miss Gaston," she said. "I think we might be friends, if Lady Theobald would let us. Her superior advantages might do me good. They might improve me," she went on, with a little laugh, "and I suppose I need improving very much. All my advantages have been of one kind."

When he had left her, she startled Miss Belinda by saying:

"I have been asking Mr. Barold if he thought I was fast, and I believe he does—in fact, I am sure he does."

"Ah, my dear, my dear!" ejaculated Miss Belinda, "what a terrible thing to say to a gentleman! What will he think?"

Octavia smiled one of her calmest smiles.

"Isn't it queer how often you say that!" she remarked. "I think I should perish if I had to pull myself up that way as you do. I just go right on, and never worry. I don't mean to do anything queer, and I don't see why any one should think I do."

CHAPTER XVI.

CROQUET.

Lucia was premitted to form one of the players in the game of croquet, being escorted to and from the scene by Francis Barold. Perhaps it occurred to Lady Theobald that the contrast of English reserve and maidenliness with the free and easy manners of young women from Nevada might lead to some good results.

"I trust your conduct will be such as to show that you at least have resided in a civilized land," she said. "The men of the present day may premit themselves to be amused by young persons whose demeanor might bring a blush to the cheek of a woman of forty, but it is not their habit to regard them with serious intentions."

Lucia reddened. She did not speak, though she wished very much for the courage to utter the words which rose to her lips. Lately she had found that now and then, at times when she was roused to anger, speeches of quite a clever and sarcastic nature presented themselves to her mind. She was never equal to uttering them aloud, but she felt that, in time, she might, because of course it was quite an advance in spirit to think them, and face, even in imagination, the probability of astounding and striking Lady Theobald dumb with their audacity.

"It ought to make me behave very well," she was saying now to herself, "to have before me the alternative of not being regarded with serious intentions. I wonder if it is Mr. Poppleton or Francis Barold who might not regard me seriously. And I wonder if they are any coarser in America than we can be in England when we try."

She enjoyed the afternoon very much, particularly the latter part of it when Mr. Burmistone, who was passing, came in, being invited by Octavia across the privet hedge Having paid his respects to Miss Belinda, who sat playing propriety under a laburnum tree, Mr. Burmistone crossed the grass-plot to Lucia herself. She was awaiting her "turn," and laughing at the ardent enthusiasm of Mr. Poppleton, who, under Octavia's directions, was devoting all his energies to the game; her eyes were bright, and she had lost for the time being, her timid air of feeling herself somehow in the wrong.

"I am glad to see you here," said Mr. Burmistone.

"I am glad to be here," she answered. "It has been such a happy afternoon. Everything has seemed so bright and—and different"

"'Different' is a very good word," he said, laughing.

"It isn't a very bad one," she returned. "And it expresses a good deal."

"It does, indeed," he commented.

"Look at Mr. Poppleton and Octavia——" she began.

"Have you got to 'Octavia'?" he inquired.

She looked down and blushed.

BARNUM'S ENGLISH TOUR.

A Steamship Laden With Animals and Performers Sai's Yesterday.

Barnum & Bailey's "Greatest Show on Earth" left Bridgeport, Conn., Monday night at its way to Brooklyn, to the Anchor Line wharf, where it will be placed on board the steamer Furnessia for London, Eng. Two hundred and forty people connected with the show will also go to London on this ship, while on the steamer City of Rome, sailing on Wednesday, Oct. 16, one hundred and sixty of the attaches will take passage. The arrangements for transporting the show have been most carefully made. Six huge boxes, twelve by ten feet, have been built, each to contain an elephant. When placed on board ship these boxes will be set twelve feet apart, the intervening space forming another box, in which an elephant will also be placed, and thus the six boxes will afford accommodation for the thirteen elephants to be taken. The camels and horses will be placed in a series of stalls distributed all over the main deck of the vessel. The cages containing the animals, after first being detached from their running gear, will be placed side by side, with sufficient space between to permit the attendants to feed the beasts and attend to their wants. An idea of the quantity of material required to feed the various animals may be had from the following list: There will be 80 tons of hay, 2,000 bushels of oats, 6 tons of straw, 6 tons of bran, 25 bushels of corn, 20 bales of peat moss, 30 barrels of carrots, 6,000 pounds of fresh beef, 1,500 pounds of fresh fish, 15 barrels of potatoes, 150 heads of cabbage, 6,000 pounds of fresh bread, 10 barrels of sweet apples, 5 barrels of onions, 7 barrels of turnips, 20 barrels of sea biscuits, 400 cans of condensed milk, 4 sacks of salt, 150 pounds of Glauber salts, all exclusively for the animals and horses. All the meat and fish will be frozen and placed between alternate layers of ice in huge refrigerators especially built for the purpose. The condensed milk is chiefly for the monkeys and Polar bear. The expense of the show going to Europe is said to be the heaviest ever assumed in this line. About $150 a day has been spent in cable despatches to and from Europe during a period of nearly four months past. The advertising material to be distributed free in London has already cost $166,000. The new costumes, including those made in Paris for Kiralfy's "Nero," in which 800 people will appear, and those for the circus department have cost $90,000. Altogether it is estimated that the expenses of the affair, before a single performance is given, will foot up $350,000, exclusive of salaries, and all this for a probable season of one hundred days. The estimated expenses for the London season, calculating $6,800 a day for the circus, will be nearly $12,000 a day, from which the risks of the trip can be judged. But Mr. Bailey says: "I don't care for the expense even if I lose $100,000. I just want to show the people of Europe what a big thing is. We know it in this country, but they do not over there."

Mr. and Mrs. Barnum and Mr. Barnum's nephew, C. Barnum Seeley, sailed Saturday on the Etruria.

Sam Jones.

"Sam Jones, I see, is getting $50 a day for preaching," remarked a Methodist, "and the cynical newspapers are making much of the fact. I don't know as I blame them for criticising. It is a natural feeling to distrust a minister who goes about preaching for so much per sermon, just like a public lecturer who speaks for so much per lecture. It may be all right, but it looks bad to the public and is certain to create adverse comment. Of course, a preacher has to be supported. We support our ministers comfortably, and nobody finds fault with that. But when a man makes a business proposition, that for so much money he will come and get up a religious revival among us, I can't help feeling suspicious and slightly antagonistic. Sam Jones is a smart man, and his methods are like those of some other revivalists, but I can't help thinking he lays himself liable to serious criticism."—Louisville Post.

How Do You Lace Your Boots?

Not one person in a thousand laces his shoes correctly. About the nearest anybody gets to it is to lace as tightly as possible. The correct way is to put your foot when you are about to lace your shoe as much as possible in the heel of the shoe, says Vanity Fair. You can do this best by lacing your shoes with the heel of your shoe resting in a chair standing in front of the one you are seated in. Over the instep the lacing should be drawn as tightly as possible. This will hold your foot back in the shoe, giving the toes freedoom and preventing their being cramped. Lace about the ankle to suit your comfort.

Riding on a Bear.

Near Forester Falls the other day young Mr. Bulmer, of Ross, discovered a bear quietly feeding on a field of oats. He put two charges of shot into Bruin, but he showed ability to escape with alacrity. Mr. Bulmer with daring ran up to the bear and sprang on its back, determined at all costs to prevent his escape. The bear was a powerful specimen and seemed quite equal to the task of carrying off his rider. Mr. Thomas Faught, a noted marksman, appeared on the scene with a gun, and with a well directed shot laid the bear low not in the least injuring or even frightening the courageous rider.—Hepworth Sun.

DEATH PASSED.

Awful Moment for a Car Full of Passengers on a Level Crossing.

The St. Louis express was rushing into Jersey City. A street car was rolling along to the Grove street crossing of the Pennsylvania Railroad. William Pearsall, the gate tender, carefully lowered the gates just after the street car got past and was rumbling over the west-bound track. It was near midnight Sunday night. John Connors, the car-driver, suddenly saw the headlight of a locomotive bearing down upon him. It was the engine of the St. Louis express thundering along the east-bound track. Another pull and his team would have the car, with twenty passengers, on the rails directly in front of the incoming train. Connors might have jumped and saved himself. If he had he would have heard an instant later screams and groans of dying men, women and children. The frail street car, with its load of human freight, would have been no more than a feather in the path of the giant locomotive travelling at the rate of a mile a minute. John Connors in the hour of need proved himself a hero. With his left hand he jammed the brake hard down. With his right hand he fairly dragged the horses around at a right angle to the street car. They had been in the centre of the east track. Quick as the driver was the engine was quicker, and as it flashed by it struck the off horse, and ripped him in two from head to foot. So close were train and car that the train bent and twisted the front dashboard of the street car as it swept by. John Connors, the humble car-driver, turned pale and sank on his knees, with the line still in his hand, after the danger was over. Then there was a panic in the car. The passengers realized their peril after it was over and dashed pell mell out on the tracks. Henry Meyer, the conductor, tried to stop them, but he was swept from the back platform like chaff before the wind. The passengers seemed crazed and ran haphazard across the tracks and fled in all directions. Only Conners and the conductor remained on the car.

Where Arsenic Comes From

In a recent issue of Notes and Gleanings a writer describes the arsenic industry in Devonshire. The best-known mine in that county which supplies arsenic in quantity is the "Devon Great Consols," near Tavistock. Refined white arsenic is here obtained from the rough ore, and the company is working over again in the furnaces, for the sake of the arsenic, much refuse thrown aside in the palmy copper days. In former days the fumes were allowed to pass off into the workshops and into the air, causing fatal results among the workmen and destroying the surrounding vegetation for some distance. But now that arsenic (and not copper) is the most valuable product, precautions are taken to prevent any escape. Three kinds of calciners are in use at the "Great Consols." First there is the ordinary hand calciner. Next the well-known Oxland's calciner, which is so constructed as to require no attention from the workmen. The third furnace appears to be the most efficient of the three. In it a circular table, sloping considerably from the centre to the sides, revolves at a somewhat slow rate. The ore falls on this table, which is thoroughly heated by the furnace beneath, from an opening near the centre; thence by the slope and the circular movement it is gradually distributed down towards the circumference, where, almost completely deprived of its arsenic, it falls into a trough, while the fumes pass up into the flues through an opening above the highest point. The operation is an extremely pretty one to watch, as the sulphur in the ores causes continual play of blue flames over the surface of the incandescent mass, while the air above seems misty with the fine white smoke of arsenic trioxide Prepared in this way the crude product has a dirty grey color, and is purified by further roasting in a reverbatory furnace, heated only with coke or anthracite, when it sublimes in the flues in the form of a beautifully glistening white powder, which feels to the touch as soft as flour. Sometimes fine colorless crystals are found, especially near the doors of the flues. Visitors feel unwell for the rest of the day after an inspection of the furnaces. The workers have their mouths and noses wrapped up in cloth respirators with cotton wool inside, lest by chance any particles of what the Germans call giftmehl or poison-flour might get into the air passages; all the workmen employed in sorting or packing the fine powder of white arsenic are similarly protected. All employed looked powerful men enjoying excellent health. The work has not been going on sufficiently long (about 15 years) to compare the length of life of those engaged in it with that of those employed in furnace work with non-poisonous, or at least, non-volatile poisonous bodies.

Here is a new way for a girl to get rid of a late beau. She gives him a paper and pencil with one of her sweetest smiles, and says: Now make a row of eleven ciphers; now make a perpendicular mark downward on the right of the first cipher; upward on the right of the fourth; downward on the right of the fifth; upward on the right of the seventh and eighth; downward on the tenth. The marks should be half an inch long. Ask him to read what he has written. The effect is electrical.—Rochester Herald.

THE United States leads the world in the amount of mail matter distributed by the postal authorities. In 1881, according to Mulhall, the number of pieces handled in the United States mails was 2,243 000,000. In 1888 it had increased to 3,576,100.000. In the same period Great Britain increased from 1 682.000 000 to 2,279,000,000 pieces. In 1881 the number of pieces to the inhabitant in the United States was 45, in Great Britain 49; in 1888 the number had increased to 71 in the United States and to 61 in Great Britain. In Germany the number of pieces per capita increased from 29 in 1881 to 41 in 1888; in France from 36 in 1881 to 37 in 1888.

WHO would imagine that the flannel shirt so popular during last heated term with a large circle of gentlemen could incur the condemnation of any body of men? Yet it is classed alongside of the pestilential Chinaman by President Purl chase, of the Laundrymen's National Association, now in session in Buffalo. In his annual address Mr. Purchase said the general condition of the laundry business had not been good. During the past year every kind of business had suffered depression, but it was probably felt most by laundrymen. The use of what was known as the neglige or flannel shirt had contributed largely to this result, but its reign the speaker believed would be of short duration. If laundrymen would only have patience they would soon wear their customary smiles, silk hats and probably diamonds. Speaking of Chinese competition, the President said: "Working by lamp-light morning and night, one Chinaman ordinarily did more work than three laundry girls, and, reversing the order of things, three Celestials did not eat as much as one girl. It was safe to assert that of every $100 taken in by them not $10 was ever returned to circulation. They were a pestilential, vicious, non-American race, robbing honest labor as well as capital, and the association should keep the issue constantly in motion."

A GREAT reformation has taken place in prisons and prison management since the days when Howard, the philanthropist, was spending his time in effecting the amelioration of the lot of the prisoners in British jails, but still much has to be done in the interests of humanity to make the jails the reformatories they ought to be and to manage them for the ultimate good of those detained therein as well as for their punishment in breaking the laws. The Prisoners' Aid Association of Canada, supported by the church courts of the land and the press in general, is doing a good work in this connection. It has memorialized the Ontario Government to appoint a commission of competent gentlemen to collect information regarding prisons, reformatories, houses of correction, workhouses, etc., with a view to the adoption of the most approved methods of dealing with the criminal classes. It makes a demand for the classification of prisoners, so that old and hardened criminals be not allowed to herd with and contaminate the comparatively innocent, young and susceptible. Employment of prisoners is also favored as well as their education, and the organization of Prisoners' Aid Societies is also asked for. As already stated, the Church courts have taken the matter up. The Bishop of Niagara, we learn, has appointed the following gentlemen a Committee on Prison Reform: [illegible] Cayley, Q.C., Chancellor Wicksteed, E. F. GREAT LONDON STRIKE.

Its History Told by Cardinal Manning and John Burns.

The discussion of the great London strike by Cardinal Manning and the labor agitator, John Burns, has already been mentioned in the London Despatches. It forms the leading contribution to the October number of the New Review. Both writers, apparently by a coincidence, begin with a military allusion. "In truth," says Cardinal Manning, "a strike is like a battle. No one who was in it can give an account of it. Each man knows only the events on the spot where he stood." And he intimates that, as an outsider, he is all the better able to form a just opinion of it. The Cardinal thinks the strike has done harm. It has inflicted great suffering on women and children, has brought ruin among the lesser tradesmen, and been a bar to the importation of food. He thinks that it has permanently injured the port of London, which with difficulty now holds its own against Southampton, Cardiff, Liverpool, Glasgow, and even against Antwerp and the French ports. And he hopes that a result of the strike will be a registration of laborers and an organization of labor. The effect of this organization will be to clear the docks of a great number of unskilled and indolent persons who year by year come into London. Cardinal Manning continues by remarking upon the self-restraint which has been shown upon both sides, saying: "I am bound to bear witness not only to the self-command of the men but also to the measured language and calm courtesy of the employers."

John Burns begins by remarking that he has been in the thick of the battle, and by admitting that he is therefore not an impartial witness. But he considers that he can speak with some authority as to what he has to say about his own part in the event. It was said a few weeks ago by a writer who knew Burns that Burns had told him that he expected to be hanged. He is evidently a courageous and energetic man, and has somewhat the tone of a fanatic. He meets the charge of secret conspiracy by showing how bold and open his instigations to the dockers have been for years. He had been for six years engaged in this work, making speeches to the men at dawn before his work and theirs had begun. "I myself with my wife, he says, "have frequently left home at 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning, winter and summer, tramped to the docks, made speeches at three different gates, and returned to begin my day's work in the west end at 7 or 8 o'clock. These speeches were made sitting on walls or standing astride of palings.

The success of the strike was due to the sympathy of the public. It was physically possible, because Burns and his associates had money enough to feed 250,000 people while the strike lasted. The various trades sent large contributions and promised more. The compositors sent £500 and the engineers £700. A gift of £25,000 came Australia. A sufficient supply of money having been assured, then came the difficult question of the administration of relief. The committees had recourse to the system of issuing tickets, presentable to the East End shopkeepers. By withholding money drunkenness was prevented. But they were greatly assisted by the good behavior of the people. "From first to last," says Mr. Burns, "no man asked me for money for beer. I have been in the thick of starving men with hundreds of pounds about me (they knowing it), and not a penny have I lost. I have sent men whom I did not know for change of a gold piece, and have never been cheated of a penny."

Mr Burns sums up in a few words the results of the strike. The dockers struck because the directors of the dock companies refused to give them more than 5 d an hour. This they considered poor wages, because the work was, in its nature, not continuous. The wages have now been advanced to 6 d an hour. Three pence an hour more than the former rate is paid from 6 to 8 p.m., and 2 d per hour after 8. Contract has been abolished, and with it the sweating system. He claims, also, that the benefits of the strike have been felt by other trades. The carmen employed by the post-office have secured rises of from 1s to 4s a week. Workers in the chemical manufactories along the Thames, engineering laborers and some two hundred London trades have gained a 10 per cent. advance on their old wages. As might be expected, Mr. Burns does not agree with Cardinal Manning as to the conduct of the representatives of the dock companies. He says that they never seemed to know their own business.

The sympathy of the general public was manifestly with the strike. The feeling seemed to pervade all classes. The East End pawnbrokers would not charge interest on the goods left with them by the strikers, and the East End landlords and lodging house keepers refused rent as long as the strike lasted. Numbers of men marched in the processions who were not dockers and had nothing to gain by the success of the strike. But it never did not that the strikers had on their side, not only the workmen and the small shopkeepers, but the middle and upper classes as well. Not only civil servants, soldiers, policemen, fishermen, and the skilled men of Southwark send their subscriptions, but checks were received from noblemen, clubmen, and clergymen. "I remember," says Mr. Burns, "the half-sovereign which an officer of the guards gave me in the park, with a half-uttered suggestion that if he were called upon to act against the strikers he would give them 'blank cartridges'"—New York Times.

A Schoolboy Strike.

The strike of Scottish school boys which began in Hawick has spread to Glasgow, Govan, Greenock, Port Glasgow and other places in the west of Scotland, and also into Ayrshire and about Aberdeen. The boys have formed regular labor-like parades, with banners and cries for "shorter hours." The strike has also spread into England. The other day 100 malcontents paraded the streets of Barnet, demanding "abolition of the cane, less hours in school, less parsing and no home lessons."

WHITECHAPEL JACK.

A Doctor on the Track of a Suspicious Boarder.

The London edition of the New York Herald says: There is one man in London who knows more about "Jack the Ripper" than all the policemen and detectives in the metropolis. This gentleman, who possesses sufficient material and circumstantial evidence to hang ten "Jack the Rippers," is in secret communication with Dr. Forbes Winslow. "Jack the Ripper" is known. He is known to the police, and he is known to several other persons. The latter have supplied the former with full descriptions of his personality, manners and habits, and at certain times there has actually been no doubts as to his whereabouts. The invisibility in which "Jack" is enveloped is gowing thinner, and to those who have followed his murderous movements it is certain that Nemesis is closing upon him, and that within a period that may be measured his capture and identity will be effected.

A gentleman, living at Brixton, called upon Dr. Forbes Winslow several times to give information anent a Whitechapel murder, but unfortunately every time he called the doctor was out. The doctor is on the murderer's track. He possesses tangible proof of identity, and is convinced that he could effect his arrest in a week. He means to act upon the clue suppliedto him, and he does not intend to call in the assistance of the police. Here is his remarkable story: A gentleman, whom he had previously known, called upon him in reference to the Whitechapel murders. "Jack the Ripper" lodged in this person's house. He knew that it was "Jack the Ripper" by putting two and two circumstances together. Suspicions were first aroused by the lodger coming home about 4 o'clock one morning. He had expected to find everybody in bed, and to be able to get to his room unobserved, To his surprise, his landlord, Dr. Winslow's informant, had been kept up waiting for his wife, who was on a visit to some friends. The lodger was excited and incoherent in his talk. He said he had been having a rough time, that he had been assaulted, and had his watch stolen; and he gave the name of a police station where he had laid a complaint. Upon inquiries this story was found to be entirely devoid of foundation. He had made no complaint, and the police had no knowledge of a street disturbance. The man's shirt and underclothing were found hanging over chairs. They had been washed and had been put out to dry. He was in the habit of talking about the women of the street, and wrote "long rigmaroles" about them. His writing, in minute particulars, resembled that of the letters sent to the police purporting to come from "Jack the Ripper." He had a wardrobe as extensive as a duke's. It included eight suits of clothes, eight pairs of boots and eight hats. The man can speak several languages, and when he went out he always carried a black bag. He was apparently well off, and never wore the same hat on two successive occasions. When he left his lodgings a quantity of bows, feathers and flowers and other articles, which had belonged to the lower class of women, were found in his room. He also left behind him three pairs of boots and three pairs of goloshes, one of each of which is now in the possession of Dr. Winslow. The boots are ordinary leather lace-up boots, with thin soles. The goloshes have indiarubber bottoms and American cloth uppers, and are bespattered with blood. Upon this and other material a most important clue is thought to have been discovered.

A Eulogy on Silk.

Silk is an agreeable and healthy article. Used in dress it retains the electricity of our bodies; in the drapery of our rooms and furniture covers it reflects the sunbeams, giving them a quicker brilliancy, and it heightens colors with a charming light. It possesses an element of cheerfulness, of which the dull services of wool and linen are destitute. It also promotes cleanliness, will not readily imbibe dirt, and does not harbor vermin as kindly as wool do s. Its continually growing use by man, accordingly, is beneficial in many ways. Grace and beauty, ever, owe something to silk. You cannot stiffen it like thick woollen or linen without destroying all its gloss and value. The more silk ribbons, therefore the more silk kerchiefs and robes are used instead of linen and wool—the more graceful becomes the outward aspect of mankind. A number of strange, grotesque fashions originating in the use of linen would never have been invented during the more general employment of silk. The flattering of ribbons, the rustling and flowing skirts of silk, the silk kerchief closely knotted round the neck, have materially contributed to make our customs more natural and pleasing to the eye.—Exchange.

Johnstown's Flood a mere Gill.

The amount of water passing over Niagara Falls varies with the height of the river. Professor W. D. Gunning estimates the average amount at 18 000 000 cubic feet per minute. Allowing 62½ pounds to the cubic foot, this would give a total of 262 500 tons per minute, or 25,312 500 tons in forty-five minutes, of which somewhat more than two-thirds passes over the Horse-shoe Falls. Other estimates place the total amount passing over both falls as high as 100,000,000 tons per hour. In comparison, the flood at Johnstown was a gill.—Iron.

KILLING AN ELEPHANT.

Rider Haggard has told some marvellous stories, descriptive of the mixed pleasure and danger of killing elephants in their wild state, but it seems from the story that comes from Berlin that it is quite a formidable undertaking to despatch one of the monsters, with all the resources of civilization at command. "Rustum" is one of the two Indian elephants presented in 1881 by the Prince of Wales to the Zoological Gardens at Berlin. The animal some few years ago ran his warder through the body with one of his tusks. The poor keeper died from the effects of his wound. Sentence of death was not at the time passed on the culprit; it was deferred, and only quite recently solemnly proclaimed. "Rustum" was, however, not condemned to the scaffold for this crime alone; he is said to have learned nothing from the clemency shown to him after the above mentioned outrage, and to have displayed on divers occasions since that time evident symptoms of a wicked and depraved nature. Moreover, his external appearance, as compared with that of his colleagues in another part of the elephant house, is declared to be anything but attractive, and to have brought discredit on the establishment. Some gossips attributed this to the want of food—it being affirmed that he has had to live on almost starvation rations, besides having had his feet in irons since the commission of his foul crime. Be that as it may, the director of the Zoological Gardens, after long and deliberate consideration, and after having consulted all the experts, sentenced "Rustum" to die by strangulation. The mode of his death had also been previously carefully considered. Some proposed that he should be shot; but this method was considered dangerous, lest the bullet should not take immediate effect, or lest the sports man's hand should tremble and miss the mark. Others preferred poisoning, and some suggested the electric current. All these propositions were rejected in favor of a process of strangulation by a three-quarter inch steel wire. Every precaution having been taken, the noose was let fall over the monster's head at what was supposed to be a favorable moment. This was when he passed out of his half-opened cage in order to sniff the morning air. No fewer than forty-two men were stationed in the vicinity to draw the noose tight. Whether it was that the dumb creature had a presentiment that these were his executioners, ruthlessly bent on depriving him of light and life, or whether it was that the arrangements were clumsily made, the main point is certain—namely, that "Rustum," as soon as he felt the pressure of the wire, quietly made a slight movement in the opposite direction and snapped the substance that was to strangle him as if it had been cotton thread. The executioners were discomfited; the chief officers were dumbfounded; but "Rustum" took no further notice of them, and continued his promenade around his out-of-door enclosure. The next attempt to settle "Rustum" is postponed till after the director's return.

If a man works 100 hours in 6 days he is entitled to a seventh day of rest. He is entitled to this much, not only because his body and mind demand the relaxation, but because industrial conditions should be such as to enable him to earn a sufficient livelihood in six-sevenths of a week. There is scriptural warrant, as well, for the day of rest; but for purposes of the present contest, into which so many and so different classes and creeds enter, religion may well be set aside and the question urged solely on economic [illegible] Henry George.

MR. WIMAN AND THE DESTINY OF CANADA

Some time ago Mr. Erastus Wiman, of New York, wrote a pamphlet, headed with the inquiry, "What is the Destiny of Canada?" In a pamphlet Mr. Wiman does not reply satisfactorily to his own query, but it may be deduced from his writing that he believes Canada will eventually become merged in the identity of the republic to the south of us. It is Mr. Wiman's dearest wish that this should be the case. For years he has been spending time and money with a lavish hand to bring about the consummation so devoutedly wished by him. Why is he doing this? What are his motives? One cannot imagine that they are purely philanthropic, although Mr. Wiman has the fame of being a philanthropist in certain lines. Even if his pet wishes were gratified, we cannot understand why posterity would have just cause for looking upon this gentleman in anything approaching the light of a great philanthropist and therefore, in the estimation of this paper, we must look further for a motive. Mr. Wiman is also amatorious none more so. His whole life has taught us that. His success in a financial sense has been remarkable, and satisfactory to himself, and now that he has climbed to the pinnacle of prosperity he finds that the eyes of humanity have not followed him with quite the amount of admiration which his longing soul desires. Therefore to chain the attention of the people on this continent for all time his massive brain has produced a gigantic scheme which, if consummated, would cause his name to be connected indelibly with the history of this continent. This may not be a charitable view, but when all the facts are taken into consideration we feel positive that it is a just one. The knowledge that Mr. Wiman is anything but a second Sir Moses Montefiore in private life lends additional and telling evidence that he is not the genuine philanthropist in this crusade which his disciples would have us believe.

What are his methods? They are worthy of a master mind in some respects, and prove that he is a diplomatist of no mean order. His tactics are cunningly wrought out in magazine articles, speeches, manipulation of his own telegraph wires, pamphlets scattered broadcast, political banquets, etc. He misses no opportunity of glorifying the "magnificent prospects of Canada," to American eyes, and the "unlimited markets of the United States" to Canadians. The United States is to feed upon Canada, and Canada is to grow fat under the operation. It is plainly a case of "dog eat dog," only in this instance each dog is expected to fatten off the other dog. It is a strange theory, this which Mr. Wiman advances, but he relies upon the belief that he can make us believe that Canadians are the ones to whom the banquet will be served, and the people of the United States vice versa. The day of such tactics is happily numbered. The press of to-day renders them impossible of achievement, through its exposures. Mr. Wiman's sophistry has been exposed and its effects have been nullified.

Foiled in his dearest wish, Mr. Wiman then advocated commercial union and continued his crusade on a different line, and in this he has met with greater success, being reinforced by the body politic called Reformers, who have only lately declared themselves champions of Unrestricted Reciprocity, or in other words Commercial Union. Since that declaration one significant battle has been fought—that of Richelieu—in which Mr. Massue, Conservative, defeated Mr. Beauchemin, champion of Unrestricted Reciprocity, by a largely increased majority over the former election, of Mr. Labelle, in 1887. This is only one of the many blows which will shortly be struck against Mr. Wiman's "fad," and that gentleman, though still hopeful, will no doubt shortly be brought to an acute knowledge of the fact that Canada is capable of working out her own destiny without foreign interference or speculative theorizing on the part of American fame-hunters. Her destiny, too, will not be what Mr. Wiman desires. She is drifting farther away from that goal every day—gaining a better knowledge of her own powers, her own importance and privileges. Mr. Wiman may dream of annexation and walk in a somnambulistic state from the Gulf of California to the Arctic ocean, and call it all a continent republic, with himself as President, but that will not make it one. Canada has an identity which she is not going to dispose of for a mess of pottage.

SANCTUM SKETCHES.

A newspaper man comes in contact with all the different patterns of mankind which an all-wise Providence has blocked out, and they are manifold. The portly gentleman, jolly, happy, self-satisfied, walks in and planks down his dollar for the newspaper with an air of pride in the knowledge that he is about to make for the year his best investment. Mr. Vinegar Visage walks slowly in after him and tries to persuade the editor that his paper is only worth seventy-five cents, but at last grumblingly loosens his miserly grasp of the dollar and leaves behind him when departing an air of discontentment and an odor of niggardliness. Then comes a bashful young man, and even before he enters the door you are safe to wager that he either wishes to subscribe for his sweetheart, who lives away off, or has a mule or two of fresh, juicy poetry for the waste basket. We have also met the man who is two years behind in his subscription, and who walks in with an air of assurance and informs you that the label on his paper is wrong, and that he holds at home your receipt, but forgot to bring it with him. In nine cases out of ten that man is a borrower of the truth and a trader in fiction, or his negligence in not having the error corrected is unpardonable. There are some seven hundred and sixteen other types of humanity which the country editor meets, but the fiction-monger downs them all.

Talking about liars, you will find them in every walk of life. They have even been discovered in the newspaper profession. It is so rarely that this occurs, however, that a case of the kind is worthy of note. We met a newspaper man in Toronto two years ago who had traveled all over this wide world. He had personally inspected the torrid sands of Africa, the crystal slopes of Enderby Land and Iceland; had been shipwrecked and was the only surviving person out of 315 souls; was at one time Postmaster-General of the State of Kentucky for twelve hours through an accident. These reminiscences were highly entertaining, but the author went a step too far. We swallowed them all with a gullibility born of innocence until he tried to choke down our thorax a charming tale of a fishing picnic which he enjoyed in the Highlands of Scotland, in company with the daughters of the late General Gordon, who died at Khartoum (peace be to his ashes), when we became suspicious that our literary friend was a blooming imposter. General Gordon was never married, and therefore his daughters were myths. We have never since spoken to that literary gentleman, and never intend to. He borrowed two dollars from us on the strength of that story, and the last heard from him he was heading for Honolulu by rail—on foot. He left a few of his relatives behind. 'Tis sad to think we will never again see him, but it is pleasant to remember that the way of the liar is hard. We detest liars, and never indulge in flights of fancy ourselves. Ahem!

Our School.

To the Editor of The Advance.

I noticed a short paragraph in your paper regarding a teacher for our school, mentioning her name, and I presume, excepting one or two persons, it receives a general endorsation.

Irreproachable in character, industrious, and determined to succeed in a calling she has voluntarily selected, and one in which her delight would be to excel, make it mysterious why she is not the choice. Then, too, raised from infancy among us, adds another reason why we should do honor to one of our own. But so far as is learned, the prevailing idea is that a person holding a higher grade certificate must be had, as if the ability to teach consisted in the certificate held, but the school law determines that a person holding a third class certificate covers the ground required, and therefore as to ability, it depends on the kind of teacher you happen to get.

The pokey trustees think a higher grade and more pay is the panacea for weakly irresolute teachers. But seriously, will the ratepayers calmly submit to be taxed more for school purposes than at present? I think not. Burdened with the new school house and grounds, one is astonished that there can be a man found in the school section to propose such a thing. One thing is well known, that Dr. Christoe was elected purely upon the ground that taxes in this direction should be curtailed. It will be curious to know what his position is in this matter. To my mind it is infinitely better to employ a person who is well known, all other things being equal, than one that is not. At any rate the village must see that the taxes are kept down. RATEPAYER.

Inistioge.

From our own Correspondent.

Mr. Geo. Johnson, sr., died suddenly at his residence here on Wednesday morning last. As was his custom, Mr. Johnson got up at an early hour for the purpose of kindling the fire, but before reaching the stove he was seized with a feeling of weakness and called upon his son for help which was promptly given, but before the son had time to lay his father back upon the bed from which he had risen but a moment previous, apparently in good health, his spirit had winged its flight. Mr. Johnson was a good friend and neighbor. In politics he was a staunch Conservative. He was upwards of eighty years of age, and was one of those hardy old pioneer north of Ireland men, who cheated death so long. Mr. Wm. Chambers, of Owen Sound, was present at the funeral.

One day last week a freight car was sidetracked here, consigned to local business men. The first half of the goods unloaded was barrels of beer for our hotel keepers, and the other half was coffins for Messrs. Hills & Dillingham, the undertakers. Significant car-load that! The beer keg has been rolling ahead of the coffin, and the coffin sliding as fast as it can after the beer keg, for the last three hundred years, and they are constant companions and sworn allies yet.—[Pickering News.

A GIFT!

SOMETHING

FOR EVERYBODY

In order to secure another thousand subscribers before January next we have decided to make a great sacrificial offer for the balance of this year.

We have made arrangements with a publisher whereby we are enabled to make a magnificent gift to all our subscribers. We offer you your own choice from a list of splendid books, printed in clear type on good paper, or a monthly farmer's magazine for one year, upon the following terms: Every new subscriber remitting one dollar to us between the date of this circular and Jan. 1 next will receive The Advance for 1890 and balance of this year free, and may also select one from our list of books. And in order that all may fare alike we offer to our old subscribers, who will send in any arrearages and the dollar in advance for next year, before, or on Jan. 1, 1890, a choice from the appended list of books.

N. B.—The books will not be delivered until after Jan. 1, next, in order that all may be sent out at one time. Where they are to be sent by mail five cents extra must be sent with the order, to pay postage.

This is a bona fide gift, made as an experiment, and the most liberal ever made by a local newspaper. The names will be enrolled as received and the books delivered in that order. Here is the list:

1 THE AMERICAN FARMER, monthly, for one year.
2 A House of Tears, by L. Downey.
3 Sara Crewe and Edith's Ploughar, by Francis Hodgson Burnett.
4 The Abbey Murder, by Joseph Hatton.
5 The Argonauts of North Liberty, by Bret Harte.
6 The Fortunes of Philippa Fairfax, by Mrs. F. H. Burnett.
7 Dr. Glennie's Daughter, by B. L. Farjeon.
8 A Mere Child, by L. B. Walford.
9 The Queen's Token, by Mrs. Cashel Hoey.
10 A Missing Husband, by George R. Sims.
11 The Fatal Wife, same author.
12 An Algonquin Maiden, by G. Mercer Adam and R. Wetherald.
13 Heaven and Hell, by E. Swedenborg.
14 Stranger than Fiction, by Kenneth Lee.
15 The Story of an African Farm, by Ralph Iron.
16 John Ward, Preacher, by Margaret Deland.
17 Buffalo Bill, by Ned Buntline.
18 Michael Strogoff, by Jules Verne.
19 The Gunmaker of Moscow, by S. Cobb, a capital story.
20 Maria Monk.
21 Robert Elsmere, by Mrs. Humphrey Ward.
22 Rudder Grange, by Frank R. Stockton.
23 Ten Nights in a Barroom, by T. S. Arthur.
24 A Dangerous Catspaw, a detective story.
25 Helen's Babies, by Habberton.
26 Ben Hur, by General Lew Wallace.
27 Seaside Cook Book.
28 Day's Ready Reckoner, complete.
29 Chesterfield's Letter Writer and Etiquette, Complete.

Remember these two facts: You secure what is admittedly the best local paper in Grey, and get a present of another dollar paper or a book to while away the winter evenings. Our offer only holds good up to and including Jan. 1, 1890. Such another offer will, in all likelihood, never be made again. Do not put off sending in your orders until the last moment.

The fall assizes will open in Owen Sound on Tuesday next, Nov. 5. The most important case to be tried is that of the Baltic outrage.

Inspector Campbell informs us that the number of changes which will be made in the teaching profession in his inspectorate at the end of this year is something remarkable.

M. Richardson, Esq., occupied the pulpit of the Methodist Church on Sunday morning last and Dr. Christoe in the evening. This was made necessary owing to the unexpected detention in Toronto of the pastor.

Mr. Malcolm Kennedy left with us a bag of magnificent potatoes on Thursday last. They were of the White Elephant variety, and were truly elephantine. Malcolm is an Irishman, and naturally knows how to raise good potatoes.

Mr. Anderson had a valuable turkey stolen from off its roost on Friday night last, which proves that there is some individual in Flesherton who is an undesireable citizen. Pity he could not be discovered.

The social held at the residence of Mr. Jas. Beecroft on Friday evening last was poorly attended, but the few who were so fortunate as to be there enjoyed themselves thoroughly. Supper was served from 8 to 9 o'clock, and the remainder of the evening was occupied with games, etc.

The Orangemen of Feversham will hold a grand celebration at that place on Tuesday Nov. 5th. The program consists of a tea served from 4 to 6 p.m., vocal and instrumental music, speeches, recitations and dialogues. Admission 25 and 15 cents. See bills.

We received a little luxury on Saturday last from Mr. Wm. Guy, of Maxwell, in the form of a basket of white winter radishes. They are our favorite vegetable, and Mr. Guy has the heartfelt thanks of The Advance staff for his generous and tasty gift.

On Friday morning last four or five sportsmen of this village drove out into proton with the intention of slaying all the deer in that section of country. They arrived home again on Saturday at noon. The deer which they went out to slay are still unslayed. Of course the woods was full of tracks, and several times they narrowly escaped seeing a deer, but the weather was unfavorable, the zodiacal signs not right and several other things—mostly the latter—and venison steak is still a scarce article in this village.

CARPETS—In this line M. Richardson & Co. are showing an extensive range, and at prices that have not previously been touched here. Everyone furnishing should see their stock.

To Rent.

One small store to rent, in the best business block in Flesherton; suitable for office or any business requiring only small storage; 12 ft. frontage; rent only $25 per year. Apply to J. E. Moore.

The new makes of felt boots shown by M. Richardson & Co. are a great improvement on anything offered before in this line. They have a big range of felt socks and rubbers.

The Royal Templars of Flesherton are, as we noticed before, preparing the drama "Ten Nights in a Barroom," for presentation some time early in December. The various characters are all taken by suitable people, and the rehearsals give promise that the drama will be presented in a superior manner. The Advance has been surprised at the amount of first-class dramatic talent which Flesherton has displayed since this play was first spoken of. Stage manager Russell makes 'em russle around and don't you forget it. Also, don't you forget to go and see it when it is presented.

WANTED—Ducks, Turkeys, geese and chickens, for which highest prices will be paid by M. Richardson & Co.

The following clipping from the Minot, Dak., Journal, will be of interest to our readers: "Wm. Strain and wife, accompanied by their little daughter, from Canada, are visiting their children in this city. Mr. Strain finds his three boys doing as well as a father could wish to see them, and he has just cause to feel proud. If every father in the land could find his children as highly respected in a community and as prosperous in business this would indeed be a happy world." In looking over the paper from which the above quotation is made we notice that the Strain Bros. are strict believers in in the efficacy of printer's ink, and that is probably one great secret of their prosperity, coupled with push and enterprise. From a private letter we learn that Mrs. Strain has been much benefitted in health since her arrival in Dakota.

Among the 1000 Islands.

Gananoque, Ont. is beautifully situated in the very midst of the Thousand Islands, but its citizens are equally as liable as those of other sections to Catarrh. W.B. Fullerton, Druggist, says:—A prominent citizen of our town expresses great delight over miraculous healing properties of your Nasal Balm. He has suffered for a long time from a severe headache over the eyes, and his head was so stopped up that he was in great distress. One application gave instant relief and in two days he was entirely cured.

A Horrible Example.

Brother Spurr, who runs a spicy little newspaper somewhere out in the country (we think it is near Creemore) enjoys himself thoroughly these days watching the farming operations between drinks. He tells all about a threshing which he witnessed the other day, in the following language. "There was a threshing at the back of our office on Tuesday. We could just see the stack and four men on it. It was as good as a half hour at a peanut stand to watch them. They took fire water before they began and fire water when they began, so that their motion of lifting straw was like a dog trying to lick out the inside of a salmon tin; at least their backs would suggest that attitude. The straw was slippery, or else their boots were. The atmospheric pressure of the air, too, had a seriously depressing effort on the head, for the stack builder soon lost consciousness and overbalanced himself so that he lit on the ground with the agility of a bear. He could not get up any more, so the other two hands quarreled as to who should take his place, and they both fought until they fell, tumbling off the stack near their predecessor. The man at the carriers hung out the best; but he, too, had a dizziness in his head and a worse one in his feet, so he stuck his fork into the straw and tried to hold on to that; but the fork was too long, or the man was too heavy for the fork, for both fork, man and straw came down in a heap to join the other three. As no more hands could be secured, work was suspended long before the sun showed sign of going down."

Miss Franke Henderson, of Toronto, Becomes Mrs. Hansford.

A Brilliant Gathering in Sherbourne Street Methodist Church, Toronto, Witness the Ceremony—A Long List of Presents.

HANSFORD—HENDERSON.—On Wednesday, Oct. 23rd, 1889, at the Sherbourne street Methodist church, Toronto, by Rev. Wm Hansford, D.D., father of the groom, assisted by Rev. E. A. Stafford, D.D., and Rev. A. H. Rayner, LL.D., uncle of the groom. Jeffroy E. Hansford, of Osgoode hall, barrister-at-law, to Franke, eldest daughter of J. W. Henderson, Esq., inspector of the North of Scotland Canadian Mortgage Company.

The above marriage notice appeared in the Toronto Mail of Thursday last. Miss Henderson is one of the products of this village, having lived here during her childhood where she has many warm and steadfast friends among old schoolmates. Her husband is a rising young barrister, of Toronto, who may be heartily envied the favors which Sir Cupid has showered upon him. The ceremony took place in the Sherbourne street Methodist church, which was almost filled with a large and fashionable company assembled to witness the nuptials. The marriage was performed by Rev. Dr. Hansford, assisted by Rev. Dr. Stafford and Professor Rayner. The bride is the eldest daughter of Mr. J. W. Henderson, of the North of Scotland Canada Mortgage Company, widely known in this county from his long residence in Flesherton. The bridesmaids were Miss Hansford, Miss Spink, Miss Bella Henderson and Miss Jennie Doan. Mr. W. Richardson and Mr. R.N. Henderson supported the groom. The bride was dressed in white silk faille with natural flowers and diamonds, and the bridesmaids looked charming in white and pink silk and flowers. Among the many beautiful and valuable presents were:

A DASH TO DEATH.

Another Terrible Accident on the Cincinnati Inclined Railway.

MANY KILLED AND INJURED.

A Tuesday evening's Cincinnati despatch says: The most appalling accident ever known on the inclined plane railways of this city happened to-day between 12 and 1 o'clock. It was on the Mount Auburn Inclined plane, which lies at the head of Main street, and reaching to a height of between 250 and 300 feet in a space of perhaps 2,000 feet or less. Two cars are employed, one on each track. They are drawn by two steel wire cables that are wound up on a drum at the top of the hill by an engine located there. Nine passengers entered the car at the foot of the plane and a number were on the other car at the top. The passage of the ascending car was all right until it reached the top, when, to his unspeakable horror, the faithful engineer found that the machinery would not respond and that he could not stop the engine. Only one result was possible. The car was arrested by the strong bumper which stops its progress, and as the engine continued all its force was expended on the two cables, and they under its enormous power. Then the car with its nine passengers locked within began the descent of the frightful slope. The crash at the foot of the plane was terrible. The iron gate that formed the lower end of the truck on which the car rested was thrown sixty feet down the street. The top of the car was lying almost as far in the gutter. The truck itself and the floor and seats of the car formed a shapeless wreck, mingled with the bleeding and mangled bodies of the nine passengers. Two passengers were taken out dead, one a middle-aged lady, named Mrs. Ives, the other a girl of 20, Miss Lillian Oskamp. Another, Mr. N. Kneiss, a teacher, died soon afterwards. Five others were injured, perhaps fatally, and one man escaped miraculously with but a slight injury. The names of the injured are not yet fully ascertained. J. B. Hollister and a Mr. McFadden are said to be two of them. Judge Hollister is nearly 70 years old and can hardly survive such a shock. This inclined plane was built twenty-one years ago, and this is the first accident attended with loss of life to any of the four inclined planes now in use.

SNAPPED LIKE WRAPPING THREAD

Mr. Kneiss was a teacher in a public school. He was on his way home to dinner. His body was badly disfigured. Mrs. Ives was the wife of Caleb Ives, Treasurer of the Globe Soap Works. She was on her way to visit her son, who was married a few weeks ago. Mrs. Ives was aged about 60, and her neck was broken. Joseph McFadden, aged 60, died at 2.20 p. m. Charles McFadden is his son.

THE CUT-OFF GEAR FAILED.

The accident is described as follows: As car No. 29 reached the top of the plane, Goebel, the cabman, forced down the lever which shuts of the steam. For some reason the apparatus refused to work, and the car rushed on upon the iron railing. Goebel bent all his strength upon the lever, but it failed to move. On the car rushed madly. The iron work pierced deeply into the wooden flooring, and still the cable tugged. Finally, with a grating noise the cables slipped from the brass clamps that held them, the bolt that secured them opened, and the car was free. The passengers, unconscious of trouble, were about to step from the vehicle when it shot downward. The passengers who had arisen fell together upon the floor of the car. Down the plane of several hundred feet it shot, and plunging fiercely upon the railing at the bottom was dashed to pieces. The car struck, shot far out upon Main street, and was shivered into a thousand fragments.

Chas. Goebel, who was the man at the lever and unable to stop the engine, says he complained that the "cut off" was not working properly. "I told the engineer about it this morning," he said, "and the engineer told me he had repaired it, but it was evidently still out of order, and this must have been what caused the accident."

The engineer, Howard Worder, could not be found, though this is not to be considered evidence that he is hiding. The coroner will make a thorough investigation.

THE CASUALTIES.

It was Judge W. M. Dickson and not Judge Hollister who was on the car. Judge Dickson was one of the first of the wounded to die. The list of dead now stands: Judge Dickson, Mrs. Caleb Ives, Miss Lillian Oskamp, Michael Kneiss and Joseph Hochstetter. Wounded—[illegible] McFadden, both legs broken; Joseph McFadden, cut on sides and body and internal injuries; Mrs. Hochstetter, cuts and internal injuries; Mrs. Joseph McFadden.

A Transatlantic Steamer Ashore.

A London cable says: The steamer Malta, belonging to the Cunard Steamship Company, with eighteen passengers on board on a pleasure trip to Italy, went ashore at St. Just, near Land's End, during a fog. The sea was smooth but owing to her bad position the vessel became a total wreck. All on board landed safely except one of the stokers, who was drowned. The Malta was a brig rigged iron screw steamer of 2,132 tons. She was built at Glasgow in 1865.

An Awful Mistake.

Bessie—That newly married lady you introduced me showed me a lovely ice pitcher. I asked her if it was a wedding present and she seemed quite hurt.

Jennie—No wonder. I forgot to tell you that she eloped with her husband.

A Real Perplexity.

Prospective Father in Law—How do you expect to get a[illegible] without a salary if you are going to get married?

Young Smiley Basker—That is not the point—how am I to get along if I don't get married?

"What was the most melancholy spectacle you ever witnessed?" asked Fangle. "A man with long side whiskers in swimming," replied Cumso.

Jenkins and his wife are out. He said he "feels like a fool," and she said she didn't see any reason why he shouldn't.

THE POISONED CANDY CASE.

The Jury in the Candy Poisoning Case Find a Verdict Against McDonald.

A St. John, N. B., despatch says: The MacRae inquest is still dragging along, and will probably last half of this week, as about a dozen witnesses are still to be examined. At Saturday evening's session Robert Christie, general clerk in Messrs. Barkers', said he had seen McDonald handling poisonous drugs, such as opium, sugar of lead, etc., but never remembered seeing him touch strychnine. Wm. Barker had asked him on Friday, the 4th inst., if he had any suspicions of McDonald in connection with the poisoned candy. He knew McDonald carried a key of the store, and had spoken to the bookkeeper about it, but the latter said a new lock was to be put on, and it would be all right. McDonald once told him he did not believe in God.

Charles L. Nebon, paper dealer, said the piece of brown wrapping paper found in McDonald's pocket was not the same as that around the parcel. Both were manilla, but had been made at different times and not from the same ream.

D. C. Clench, banker, said that McDonald drew an account from him on Saturday morning, Oct. 5th, saying he was going to deposit with Messrs. Barker, as they would allow interest.

W. J. Haines, assistant bookkeeper with the Barkers, admitted having lent McDonald his key on several occasions. On Tuesday evening, the 1st inst., he returned to the office about seven o'clock. He did not think any one would then be in the building and saw no light, but a few minutes later McDonald walked into the office, and picking up a pen went outside to the desk and did some writing. He saw no parcels, and could no say what he wrote on. A few moments after Wasson came in, then Gerow, the electric bell on the front door, which can be shut on or off, did not ring when he entered the store, nor when he saw McDonald, but it did when Wasson and Gerow came in. He supposed McDonald fixed it give an alarm. McDonald left the desk when the bell announced Gerow's arrival, and he thought he went out, but as Gerow did not meet him he supposed he went somewhere else in the building. On Saturday morning, Oct. 5th, Spittle and he were talking about the poisoning, and Spittle said the person who sent it might be among them. McDonald once told him he did not believe in God.

John Doherty, another of the Barkers' clerks, could throw no light on the mystery.

Howard Barker, a cousin of McDonald, was in the store on Saturday evening after the arrest and saw Peters throw McDonald's overcoat down stairs to Sergt. Hastings, but could not say who picked it up, or whether it had been searched before given to the police.

Detective Ring told of the arrest of McDonald and of going to Barkers' store afterwards and searching among the boxes, where he discovered some similar to those containing the candy. He also discovered that a bottle of strychnine was missing.

A St. John, N.B., despatch says: Two sessions of the inquest were held to-day, but no more definite evidence was adduced. The excitement over the matter is somewhat dying out, and the attendance at the examination is much smaller than at first. It is likely the evidence will be finished to-morrow evening, and the case will be given to the jury on Wednesday or Thursday.

Horatio Enslow, a clerk in Barkers' retail department, knew of young Heans's leaving his key of the wholesale department in their store for McDonald, and he had seen McDonald in their back shop [illegible] apprentice to James [illegible] McDonald's key of the store as having been made by [illegible] at his request.

Dr. James Steeves, Medical Superintendent of the [illegible] Asylum [illegible] [illegible]

J. H. Wasson, Barkers' shipping clerk, recalled, was shown the [illegible] McDonald [illegible] writing. [illegible] "0" [illegible]

[illegible] Spittle, recalled, said [illegible] when Peters [illegible]

[illegible] Stanton, Jennie K[illegible], Eva K[illegible] and Maud C[illegible], employed [illegible] Barkers', could throw no light on the mystery. Robt. Christie, recalled, was [illegible] admitted some [illegible] the figure "0," as [illegible] by Wasson.

At the evening session W. F. Best, analytical chemist, was recalled. He had examined portions of the paper on the [illegible] package and also some paper [illegible] McDonald's person [illegible] the microscope. The latter [illegible] the texture and form of construction of both papers were identical in every particular. Some green stains on [illegible] the box were from Paris green, he thought. He also examined [illegible] and [illegible] that on the candy, and [illegible] the same.

J. W. [illegible] failed to [illegible] similarity between the figures of McDonald's on the box from the store and the numbers on the candy box.

[illegible] Peters and W. H. Fry, [illegible] were [illegible] on a bit of paper found on McDonald, and said it was part of [illegible] McDonald's writing [illegible] the figures and [illegible] by the same person [illegible] cousin of McDonald, was a playmate of his. On Saturday morning a week ago, the day of the arrest, he went into Bakers' retail store, and, in going behind the counter to the back shop, heard Arthur tell his elder brother Howard that their mother, Mrs. George Barker, got some candy and had burned it. He knew nothing further, but gave the names of several others who heard the conversation.

A St. John, N. B., despatch of Tuesday says: The Coroner's Court sat morning and evening and examined several witnesses. Mrs. Ann Heans, mother of Barkers' clerk, said her son had told her of lending his key to McDonald, but had said nothing about mailing packages for him. Young Heans was recalled and denied that he had ever mailed any package for McDonald. J. H. Wasson, recalled, said he thought Peters told him the reason he went to the Coroner's to examine the boxes was because he thought they had similar ones in the store.

Arthur Barker, 11 years of age, son of George Barker, remembered going to his uncle's store on Saturday morning, Oct. 5th, in company with other boys, but denied the statement made last evening by Harry Taylor, that he said his mother had received a box of candy and burned it. He said the conversation took place in the cellar of their house, and he told Taylor his mother said that if she had received a box of candy she would burn it. Clarence Buckingham and Colin Clark, aged 11 and 14 respectively, were called and substantiated Taylor's statement in every particular.

Sergt. Hastings told of going for McDonald's coat on the evening of his arrest in company with Howard Barker. He was kept waiting, he said, for some time, and the coat was finally passed out to him through the retail store. Macaulay, turnkey of the jail, said he was walking in the yard on Saturday evening, and on hearing voices looked into the surgeon's room, where McDonald was confined, and heard him tell Howard Barker to go get his coat hanging in the wholesale and bring it back without disturbing anything in the pockets.

Frank Crabe, head of Barkers' retail department, testified as to the rules governing the sales of poison, etc., which he said did not apply to the wholesale clerks. He threw no light on the mystery. S. Kerr, Principal of the Business College and teacher of writing, was shown the addresses on the candy packages, and said they had evidently been written with a blunt pen. He noticed the figure "0" on the Descyres and Dienstadt packages and also saw the same peculiarity in the numbers made by McDonald on some boxes in Barkers' store.

The Coroner then said this was nearly all the evidence, and that sessions would be held on Thursday afternoon and evening, when any additional statements would be taken and the case submitted to the jury. The general opinion here is that while the evidence is sufficient to send McDonald up for trial, it is not sufficient to convict him.

A St. John, N.B., despatch says: The inquest in the candy poisoning cases finished this evening. Most of the time of the afternoon and evening sessions was spent in reading over the depositions. Some few questions were asked, but no important information was brought out. Coroner Berryman began his address to the jury at 9 30 o'clock and it was a few minutes after twelve when he finished. He reviewed all the points of the case and charged strongly against McDonald.

The jury were out exactly an hour, and returned the following verdict: "Catherine H. Macrae came to her death from eating a candy upon which or in which strychnine had been placed, and which candy had been sent through the post addressed to the Rev. Donald Macrae, and received [illegible] on Wednesday morning, Oct. 2nd, 1889; and, further [illegible] that the said [illegible] McDonald [illegible] and murder [illegible] said Catherine H. Macrae. McDonald will be charged [illegible] by Inspector Weatherhead.

A Mother's Terrible Crime

A Santa Anna, Cal., despatch of Wednesday says: [illegible] Mrs. Effie L. [illegible] was [illegible] in her house at [illegible] a frightful cut in her throat. Near her were her two children, a boy aged 5 and a girl aged 3, also with their throats cut. [illegible] had murdered her children [illegible] attempted to kill herself. Schell, three years ago, [illegible] the [illegible] of the children [illegible] Recently Schell entered suit to gain the custody of the children, and this was the cause of the crime.

Where the Slipper Was Found.

A Kansas City despatch says: A [illegible] number of small incendiary fires have occurred here recently. The police have discovered that the incendiaries were a band of small boys, aged from 11 to 15. They were regularly organized and called themselves "Captain Kid's pets." The members are bound by blood curdling oaths not to reveal the secrets of the Order, and all their plans were carried out according to written orders signed in blood from the arms of the young desperadoes. The leaders of the band are under arrest.

A Precious Bouquet.

The Queen of Holland recently surprised her husband in a very novel manner. On his birthday she presented him with an enormous bouquet of flowers, of the kind used in the [illegible] at opera [illegible], so heavy that it required several strong men to carry it. As it was brought close to the throne the old King stooped forward to examine it, when amidst the flowers the head of his little infant daughter peeped out, to the surprise of the monarch and the amusement of the whole court.

A Useless Expenditure.

[illegible] stuff and nonsense [illegible] me. I'll go [illegible] all right.

RAILWAY WRECKS.

A Disastrous Smash-up at Omaha—Big Wreck at Brussels.

An Omaha despatch of Wednesday says: A terrible wreck occurred on the Burlington & Missouri River Railway at Gibson, a few miles from Omaha, at 6 45 last evening. About fifty passengers were injured. Two engines were completely demolished, and a chair car and combination car were thrown from the tracks and reduced to atoms. Train No. 6, the local between Lincoln and Chicago, ran into No. 9. The former was east and the latter west bound. Gibson is the meeting point and the place where the crew on No. 9, which is a stub train that makes connections with the Kansas City express, steps to register. Both trains were due at Gibson at 6.45 p.m., but last night No. 9 was slightly behind. When the accident occurred the latter had just crossed the spur, and the engine on No. 6 struck the end, hurling both engines and the two coaches from the track. The combination coach and the chair car were both crowded with passengers, all of whom were more or less injured, while Peter Renland, proprietor of the Tremont House, was injured so badly that he died shortly after being taken to the hospital. The chair car after being overturned caught fire, and many passengers were burned in addition to their other injuries, but those who had escaped comparatively safe aided in relieving their companions. The number of the injured has not yet been ascertained.

Other Disasters.

A Brussels cable says: As a passenger train from Mons, running at full speed, was approaching the station in this city today the engineer applied the brakes to slow up. The brakes did not work and the train dashed into the station and against the buffers at the end of the track. A number of carriages were wrecked and thirty passengers injured.

A Leabonan, Ind., despatch says: A construction train bearing section men on the Midland Railway three miles from here backed into a freight train to-day. Sherman Moore, brakesman, was killed. Oliver Heath and John Fitch were fatally hurt and several others seriously injured. The freight train had failed to clear the main track in switching.

SMOKELESS "CORDITE."

A New Invention of the Modern Science of Destruction.

A London cable says: Experiments which the British Government have been making for the past two weeks with Lord Armstrong's new explosive, "cordite," have so far proved highly satisfactory, and well-informed military men already say it is the explosive of the future for small arms as well as artillery. It is absolutely smokeless, which cannot be said of the so-called "smokeless powder" just introduced by Germany, and the deadly fumes which rise from the latter are entirely absent in the "cordite." It is confidently predicted that this new explosive will work a revolution in modern armament, and quick-firing guns, which, with ordinary powder, are of little use after the gunners are enveloped in a suffocating cloud of smoke, will become powerful weapons of destruction in the future.

Suspicions of Foul Play.

A Montreal despatch of Wednesday says: This morning Coroner Bell was notified of the sudden death of a young man named Tanguay, at Levis, during the night. The circumstances surrounding the case are wrapped in mystery, and it is feared that foul play has been at work. It appears that on Monday night a Mr Tanguay, of Levis, who is employed on board a steamer, arrived home rather late and found his wife, son and another man in an intoxicated state, lying in bed together. He immediately ejected the stranger from the house, and nothing more was known of the scandal until it was rumored this morning that Tanguay, jun., aged about 25 years, had died during the night. His mother and a man named Levallee were put under arrest this morning and brought to town, the body of the deceased being still on the bed where he expired. Levallee denies any knowledge of the affair, though he was drinking with deceased and his mother last night. The latter refuses to say anything. The inquest opens to-morrow.

A Bold Gambler's Escapade.

A Kansas City despatch of Wednesday says: An exciting scene was witnessed by the passengers on the Wabash train from St. Louis this morning. Albert Hoit, of Moberly, Mo., on his way to Seattle, W.T., and having a large amount of money, was swindled out of $200 by two three-card monte men. When the swindlers attempted to leave the train one of the passengers pretended to be an officer, and placed one of them under arrest. In the excitement that ensued the monte men escaped. This state of affairs had dawned on Hoit by that time, and [illegible] a revolver he gave chase to the swindlers. He captured one [illegible] him back to the train at the point of a revolver. At the next station Randolph, the prisoner, jumped suddenly to [illegible] keeping the excited passengers at bay with a pistol, jumped off the car just as the train was moving out.

[illegible] Drowned.

A New Bedford, Mass., despatch says: During the blow on Sunday the fishing schooners Quilp and [illegible], of this port, put into Cuttyhunk [illegible] harbor for anchorage. Monday, during the heavy rain, the vessels drifted together. The crew of the Nutmeg took to the larger vessel, the Quilp. Fearing that both vessels would drag ashore, the crew of the Quilp, Capt. John Flanders, Arthur Boden and Samuel Peckham, started to row ashore in their small boat to get the life-saving crew to take the crew of the Nutmeg off. The boat capsized and all three men were drowned. The crew of the Humane Society rescued the crew of the [illegible] with difficulty. The Quilp afterwards went ashore.

—Three [illegible] were passing along a country road met old farmer. First wit—Good morrow, Father Abraham. Second wit—Good morrow, Father Isaac. Third wit—Good morrow, Father Jacob. Old farmer—I am neither Abraham, Isaac nor Jacob, but Saul, the son of Kish, who went [illegible] I have found them.

THE MACDUFF KILT.

A Bit of English History in the Modern American Gown.

An English princess does't marry an earl every day, and especially an earl who is a direct descendant of that Macduff who has been requested to "lay on" by every tragedian, from him who delighted the gallery gods in the Bowery to him who received kid gloved applause at the swell play house, says a writer in the Philadelphia Times. If you have any sentiment at all, and are a woman (I do not advise it for men), you will appear in a kilt skirt of Macduff plaid—it is a beautiful rich plaid, a red background crossed by dark blue and green lines—you have kilt of this and wear with it a scarlet cloth coat, and on your head a scarlet felt hat caught up at the side with the blackest of blackbirds that ever was shot or served in a pie. You can then try and think that you own the Castle of Wemyss (pronounced Weems) where Mary, Queen of Scots, met and loved Darnley—that you own the old house near East Wemyss, where Macduff was born, and you can think that in the castle sweet Mary Beaton talked with the other Maries of their gentle and lovely lady. You can keep saying over to yourself those four lines that tell their names:

> "Yestre'en the Queen had four Maries,
> The nicht she'll hae but three.
> There was Mary Beaton, and Mary Seaton,
> And Mary Carmichael and me."

If wearing the Macduff kilt would only make the average girl as womanly and sweet, with as little knowledge of things better left unknown, as had three of these four Maries, it would be a good idea for the United States to buy two or three cloth factories and devote them to the making of the rich, warm plaid, that the women of the nation might be clothed in it, and catch, not the fever of discontent, but the glorious summer of sweetness, amiability and love.

THE PLAGUE.

The Advance of Cholera Causing Alarm in Europe.

A Paris cable says: The cholera spectre has appeared again, and it was recently a subject of discussion at the Academie de Medecin. Dr. Proust read an exhaustive paper, which meets with the approval of the medical and sanitary authorities of France. Three months ago cholera appeared in Mesopotamia, and it has now been propagated in Persia. On August 24th the epidemic was raging at Bagdad. At that place from the 20th to the 31st of August the death rate from cholera was from 200 to 400 persons per day. Since the pest of 1831 no epidemic has been so fatal. In September the cholera spread to the Euphrates and the Tigris. The scourge has reached the Persian gulf. The southern portion of Persia is invaded, and Schiraz is threatened. The city of Recht has several times been the point of departure or the place of passage for cholera epidemics coming from Hindoustan and Afghanistan to Persia. Two of these epidemics invaded Europe in 1830 and 1846. Recht is not yet contaminated; but if the cholera does reach Recht, it being already at Kirmansgah and Hamedam, the sole safeguard of Europe will be to depend upon the measures taken by the Russian Government on the Russian frontier.

Caught in the Belting.

A Montreal despatch of Wednesday says: A youth named Alberic Provost met with a horrible death early this morning in the Montreal rolling mills. The boy, who was only 14 years old, was working in the night gang in the rolling department, and about 3 o'clock this morning, while standing near one of the wheels of the engine, his arm was caught in the belting and he was whirled around, his head striking against an iron projection with every revolution of the wheel. The machinery was quickly stopped, but his head was crushed, his arm broken and legs lacerated. He was still alive when extricated, and, thinking that something could be done for him, the ambulance of the Notre Dame Hospital was called and the sinking boy conveyed to the institution, where he died a few moments after admission. He never regained consciousness or uttered a groan.

Sir Edwin's Tribute.

It was characteristic of Sir Edwin Arnold to turn his face toward the East when standing by the Golden Gate and bid his host of friends good night in the following lines, which he has sent to the press for publication:

A FAREWELL.

> America! at this thy Golden Gate,
> Now traveling from thy green Atlantic coves,

> [illegible]
> O[illegible] hundred [illegible] where [illegible] I heard
> Sweet speech of Shakespeare—keep it consecrated!
> [illegible] Land of [illegible] Bird,
> [illegible] dear, that

San Francisco, Oct. 17th.

Other [illegible] Than Ours.

The President of the British Association, Prof. Flower, endorses Sir John Lubbock's idea that the field of inquiry is limitless, and that there may be fifty other senses and different [illegible] sound [illegible] from sight; and even within the boundaries of our own senses there may be [illegible] which we cannot hear, and [illegible] of which we have no conception. These and a thousand other [illegible] remain for solution. The familiar world [illegible] surrounds us may be a totally different place to other animals [illegible] may be full of music which we cannot hear, of color which we cannot see, of [illegible] sensations which we cannot conceive."

Clever Mr. Wiman.

Mr. Erastus Wiman [illegible] constituted himself delegate extraordinary from the Dominion. His capture of the Congress at the entertainment given by him at Niagara Falls was a clever bit of diplomacy, and his improvement of the opportunity to put the Canadian view of Pan-American affairs [illegible]

MILK AS A FOOD.

An Investigation Into What Constitutes Good Milk.

ITS RELATIVE FOOD VALUE.

Diseased Milk—The Discovery of Tyrotoxicon as a Specific Poison—Bogus Milk Preservatives.

The discussion of the milk supply of the city which has been going on in the columns of the TIMES has not been without interest for the thousands of consumers of the city, many of whom are probably mystified by the contradictory statements put forward by the parties to the controversy. Perhaps an examination into the milk question apart from the special case of our own supply will be useful in enlightening many upon some matters of importance to the public health.

GOOD MILK.

Technically speaking there is no standard of quality of milk in Ontario. The law fixes no arbitrary scale of percentages to which the dairy product must conform, although a penalty is provided for adulteration or dilution. The reason for this apparent lack is to be found in the widely varying results of analytical tests of milk made under circumstances which left no room for doubt as to the honesty of the samples and the correctness of the tests. English tests have shown a range of qualities extending from 2 82 per cent. to 4 30 per cent. of fats in tests extending over a month, while the total solids ranged from 12.1 to 14.3. The United States average official tests, according to the American Public Health Association, show water, 87.5; case in and albumen, 3.5; fats, 3 5; milk sugar, 4 8; ash, 0.7. The average result of analyses of colostrum (the fluid which the cow yields directly after calving) shows water, 73 07; albumen and casein, 19.21; fats, 3.54; milk sugar, 3.00; ash, 1.18. Milk is to be judged as well by the quantity of solids as by the fats it contains in determining its food value. A fairly good milk and one rich in fats and inorganic salts should show water, 87.4; fats, 4.0; milk, sugar and soluble salts, 5.0; casein and insoluble salts, 3 6. Milk of this quality is rich in fats and contains all the inorganic salts necessary to the body, especially the alkaline chlorides and calcium phosphates. A litmus test of fresh milk proves nothing as the reaction may be either acid or alkaline, and in many cases good milk gives both reactions, turning blue litmus red; and red litmus, blue.

INFLUENCE OF FOOD ON MILK.

The dairyman should regard his cows as so many machines for the conversion of food into milk. He would not expect a machine to turn out a first-class finished product from poor material; he should not look for more from his cows. They should have kind treatment, generous food, pure water and comfortable quarters. The sanitary conditions should be carefully guarded. Insufficient food or deficiency in quantity means poor milk and little of it. Slop food means poor milk even though the quantity be large. Foul water and improper food, badly ventilated stables, filthy quarters, all show their effects on the milk. Milk has been spoiled for cheese making by the scent of a dead calf which lay unburied in the field adjoining that in which the cows fed.

MILKING AND HANDLING.

The cow must be kindly treated and gently handled. The natural process of transforming food into milk is not completed until the fluid is expelled from the udder, and any improper treatment of a cow will not fail in having an effect upon the milk. The cow must be in a quiet mood. The milk taken from an animal which has been chased into the barnyard by the dog and milked in a quiver of nervous excitement, probably beaten or kicked to make her "let down," is unfit for food. The milking place should be clean and airy nd free from bad odors. Care should be aken to see that the cow's udder and eats have been washed thoroughly and dried clean and all loose hairs brushed away. The hands of the milker should be washed in hot water before he begins his work and no dish should be used which has not been thoroughly scalded with water heated to boiling. As soon as the milking is over the milk should be placed in an airy room and cooled. Under no circumstances should it be sealed up in cans or bottles while above 60° Farnheit. It should not be loaded into a can for the route until the cooling has been effected. In view of recent demonstrations of science it is a question whither Government should not make the sealing up of newly-drawn milk a crime against the public safety to which a severe penalty should attach. But this will be referred to later. Wherever the milk is placed let the air be pure, the surroundings scrupulously clean, the pans well scalded, use smooth tin or well-glazed earthenware (never use porus dishes) vessels and keep the temperature low. Never use zinc, copper or brass vessels for milk, as the chemical processes always going on act deteriously upon these metals rendering the mil poisonous.

CONTAMINATED AND DISEASED MILK.

Never allow milk to stand exposed in a living or sleeping room. Milk absorbs impurities readily, and the colder the milk the more rapidly the absorption of foul odors goes on. Milk that has been exposed in a sick room should never be drank by any person. Nothing more readily takes up specific germs or is so well adapted to spreading disease. Our Health Act wisely prohibits the sale of milk from premises upon which infectious diseases exist.

Unfortunately disease may exist in the dairy cow, even to an extent destructive to the health of those who drink her milk, without the knowledge of the proprietor; and indeed in some cases it may only be discoverable upon dissection. There is at present a growing opinion among investigators in that field of scientific research that to the milk of unhealthy cows the modern scourge consumption is traceable. However that may be, it has been amply demonstrated that the milk of a cow suffering from disease of any kind is unfit for food. The milk of cows suffering from simple inflammation of the udder has produced inflammation of the stomach in infants. As soon as a cow shows symptoms of sickness of any kind, the milk should not be used. Unfortunately it is impossible to detect all cases from the cow's appearance until the unhealthy milk has been drawn for food. Sometimes the first intimation of anything abnormal is given by the appearance of the milk itself. Milk which looks "ropy," and which sours in a few hours, should be eschewed. The animal has been overdriven or worried or suffers from udder disease or indigestion affecting the nerve centres. Milk whose cream "blisters" and has a bitter taste; "slimy" milk, and milk which becomes covered with a blue-colored scum of micro-organisms should not be used as food. No matter how rich in fat or how high in percentage of total solids the milk may be, the knowledge that it comes from a sickly cow should condemn it. Even boiling, useful in some cases, should not be relied on.

SPECIFIC POISONS IN MILK.

Toxicologists have but recently turned their attention to the study of lactic poisons, and the field is found to be one of special difficulty. The lay reader will probably be able to recall cases in which mysterious instances of poisoning by ice-cream and poisoning by cheese have been reported. In some instances considerable numbers simultaneously developed symptoms of poisoning. The rapidity with which decomposition progressed and the absence of appropriate analytical formulæ for the discovery of the toxic constituent, even when a part of the supposed poisonous food was obtainable, baffled for a time the efforts of investigators and often the soda water fountain suffered vicariously. Science, however, is not always baffled, and repeated failures never conclude her followers in the belief that a problem has no solution; only that the particular experiments have not been conducted on the right theory, or have been inefficiently made. They persevered, and they have in a measure succeeded in throwing light upon some hitherto mysterious poisonionge. Our food swarms with bacilli many of them defying the most powerful microscopes which science produces in her endeavors to define them. These bacilli are not always productive of disagreeable changes, but there is sometimes a remaining alkaloid or ptomaine as the result of their work, which is a source of danger to health. This ptomaine is formed from the food product by the exercise of the organism's life functions, and contains whatever may remain of the bacteria itself. The Bacterium aceti (or lactis), which converts milk or sugar into lactic acid, and the Bacillus subtilis, which brings about the production of butyric acid, are in effect all but innocuous. But there is a third fermentator, Bacterium coli, which declines to feed on milk sugar alone, but thrives on it when white of egg is added, developing lactic, formic and acetic acids, and whose presence may account for some of the mysterious ice cream poisonings of the past. It has also been discovered that a germ is sometimes found in milk which produces a disease similar to anthrax.

In 1883-4 the Michigan Health Board reported 300 cases of cheese poisoning, which, although not fatal, were in some instances sufficiently serious. Samples of the cheese were secured. A dog was offered a piece, among some other samples, and rejected it, eating the non-poisonous pieces. Prof. Vaughan after elaborate analyses, fixed the poison in alcholic extract as a fatty acid, but on resolving it to an aqueous solution for evaporation lost it. It cost him two years of patient study to fix it in crystals, as tyrotoxicon. In 1886 a Long Branch poisoning was investigated and tyrotoxicon fixed as the cause. In three fatal cases at Milan, Mich., the poison's presence was traced to decaying vegetable matter in the milk cellar. In the other cases mentioned and in many which space forbids reference to, the canning up of the milk while hot led to the development of the poison. No milk should be canned up before it has been ventilated in a free, pure atmosphere, and cooled to below 60°; and it should never be exposed to contamination of decaying or foul vegetable or animal matter.

HOW CHILDREN ARE KILLED.

The specific action of tyrotoxicon upon children has been proven experimentally to be similar to, if not identical with, that of cholera infantum. The post mortem condition of children dying of that disease is said by Prof. Vaughan to agree exactly with that caused by tyrotoxicon poisoning. In view of the fact, then, that thousands of children die of this disease annually, and the other fact that thousands (and among them those in whom the death rate from cholera infantum is the highest) are fed on cow's milk, much of which is put up in bottles or cans at the dairies, is not the professor's statement startlingly suggestive? Dr. Booker, Baltimore, reports that twenty-three varieties of bacteria were found in the intestines of infants suffering from what had been supposed to be "summer complaint."

MILK "PRESERVATIVES."

There is no milk preservative. People who add bicarbonate of soda, salicylic acid and other salts to milk with a view to preventing decomposition should be aware that the micro-organisms work on just the same. True, the bicarbonate of soda neutralizes the acid, but the breaking down of the constituents goes on, while a product dangerous to health—particularly to the health of children—lactate of soda, is formed by the chemical reaction. There is no safe milk preservative save pure air and a low temperature.

To recapitulate: Good milk is the product of healthy, well-fed cows, cleanly stabled. It must be drawn from a cow while she is in a quiet mood; the udder, teats, milker and vessels must be clean. The milk must then be placed in a clean, well-aired, cool place for ventilation and cooling, and under no circumstances must it be bottled while warm. It must never be exposed to a bad atmosphere, or allowed to stand in a sick room or living room. Should it have been exposed to contamination of any kind it should not be used as food.

MASQUETTE

One of the anomalies of modern civilization is the man who persists in shutting the office door in summer and leaving it ajar in winter.

A girl has been hugged to death at Salem, Ohio. It may be an easy death to die, but it looks like a waist of raw material.

NORTHWEST NOTES.

It has been decided not to hold an inquest into the case of Henry Kern, an aged Swiss, who committed suicide in this city last night.

E. J. Chapman, one of the contractors of the old Souris & Rocky Mountain Railroad, which was gobbled up by the Great Northwest Central, has commenced suit against McDonald & Preston, contractors for the latter road, claiming that a large balance is due him for grading done on the Souris & Rocky Mountain Road in 1883.

The contract or grading thirty miles of the Manitoba & Southeastern Railway, which will run from Winnipeg to the international boundary in a southeasterly direction, has been awarded to Sinclair & Flanigan. It is said that the Grand Trunk is one of the companies with which the Southeastern Company will connect at the boundary. The company say they mean business.

It is estimated that the Government will have at least a majority of nine or ten, and probably thirteen or fourteen, in the Legislature when it introduces its proposed legislation respecting dual languages and separate schools.

Mr. McGaw, proprietor of the Queen's Hotel, Toronto, is in town.

A petition is in circulation among the municipal councils asking the Dominion Government to provide national schools for Manitoba.

Attorney-General Martin has been heard from at Victoria, where he is examining the educational system of British Columbia. He is expected back within a week.

Lord Stanley and party left Lethbridge to-day for the Blood Reserve and McLeod.

Archbishop Tache, who is in Ottawa, nominally attending important papal ceremonies there, is believed to have undertaken the trip in connection with the projected Manitoba school legislation.

A deputation of St. Peter's Indians have left for Ottawa in charge of Mr. Jones, Anglican missionary. They will probably extend their trip to England.

Manitoba and the Northwest are enjoying Indian summer. The weather at the present time is simply delightful. The vice-regal party could not have selected a more favorable time in which to make their trip.

The election contest for Kildonan, the seat held by the late Mr. Norquay, is now in full blast. Mr. Alexander Taylor announces himself as the Conservative candidate and endorses the Norquay platform. Mr. John Gunn is out in the Liberal interest. The name of Mr. Hugh Sutherland has also been mentioned as that of a possible candidate.

The Town Hall, Montcalm municipality, has been destroyed by fire. It is believed to have been of an incendiary origin.

The friends of Mr. W. D. Smith, Portage la Prairie, are becoming very uneasy about his continued absence from home. He went to Duluth about three weeks ago with the intention of disposing of a quantity of wheat and returning in a few days. As it was generally expected he would bring home a large sum of money from the sale of his wheat, it is feared that he may be the victim of foul play. His landed interests in the town are large and valuable.

L. A. Hamilton, C. P. R. Land Commissioner, says the company's lands are pretty well sold out in the Glenboro', Holland and Treherne districts.

E. M. Gatliff's general store at Letellier, together with all his stock and book accounts, was burned the night before last No insurance.

Mr. Burgess, Deputy Minister of the Interior, who is here, on being asked as to the condition of the Halfbreeds around St. Laurent, Prince Albert and other points, said it was not very encouraging.

The price of wheat has fallen somewhat throughout the Province and 60 cents per bushel is the average price now being paid. A good deal of wheat is being shipped over the Northern Pacific to Duluth.

Translatlantic immigration to Manitoba and the Northwest so far this year has only amounted to about 1,200 souls, exclusive of Britishers, and is made up of 703 Germans, 197 Belgians and French and 300 Scandinavians.

Work on the Manitoba & Southwestern Railway has actually begun. The road is staked and ready for the graders to within a mile of St. Anne. Thirty teams with the necessary grading implements are engaged on the road. Grading was begun this morning at a point just east of the Provincial Exhibition buildings, and will be continued until the advent of cold weather.

The Manitoba Gazette contains notice of application for the incorporation of the Western Lumber Company, with headquarters in Winnipeg, and a nominal capital of $50,000. The applicants are Messrs. W. B. Scarth, M.P., W. E. Macara and A. Burrows, Winnipeg; A. Shields and John Montgomery, of Toronto.

The Northwest Council will meet to-morrow.

A shooting accident took place at the Barnardo Home. The boys were out playing soldiers, one boy was drilling the other, and gave fire, with the result that he shot his playmate, the bullet passing just an inch above the heart and through the lung. The boy now lies in the hospital at the Home and may probably recover.

James McKee, engineer, and Jas. Miller, section foreman, were badly injured by the explosion of a boiler in the engine house at the C. P. R. station at Regina.

James Ross, contractor for the Regina & Long Lake Railway, is in the city. He says 120 miles of road have been graded and work will be pushed on as vigorously as possible until the frost sets in. It is not the intention of the company to stop the work at Saskatoon this fall, as has been stated, unless the weather prevents them from proceeding further. There are 1,300 horses and mules and nearly 1,000 men employed in connection with the construction of the road.

McLaughlin, the prisoner who escaped with a fellow convict named Lamb from Negaunee, Huron County, Michigan, some months ago, was arrested here by the city police this afternoon. Sheriff McCarty, of Huron County, who was in pursuit of the prisoners, had given up the search and returned home.

In the Northwest Legislature yesterday, the Standing Committees for the session were appointed. Mr. Neff, of Moosomin, criticised the Governor's speech as being a very fine literary effort but containing not a word about prospective legislation. Mr. Haultain said the Advisory Board had nothing to do with the speech. After adjournment Justice McLeod made a proposal that the Assembly adjourn for a few days and take in the ball at Banff. After a great deal of good-humored banter it was decided to go.

A despatch from Spokane Falls, Washington Territory, says W. B. McDougall, a well-known newspaper man, nephew of Horace McDougall, of this city, is dying. McDougall was at one time connected with newspapers here. He also started the Vancouver News-Advertiser.

Large consignments of American oats have been received from St. Paul. Local dealers say that the cereal can be brought from that point and sold here cheaper than oats purchased at Portage la Prairie.

John Charlton, M P., has written Premier Greenway that he will be in Winnipeg on Nov. 8th.

The Northwest Assembly opened to-day. The Separate school and dual language question will come up for discussion.

Separate Schools and the French language must go—at least so say nearly al Northwest legislators. Messrs. Cayley, Richardson and Neff have already given notice of motions on these two questions.

Twelve carloads of cattle from the Cochrane ranch passed through the city to the east yesterday.

At a meeting of the Winnipeg Presbytery the call from Fort William Congregation to Rev. Mr. Simpson, of Toronto Presbytery, was sustained.

Mr. G. W. Yarker, General Manager of the Federal Bank, leaves for Toronto tomorrow, after a week's stay in Winnipeg. During his stay here he sold about $18,000 worth of property for the bank, and also wound up the business here.

The Winnipeg delegates to Ottawa re the improvement of Red River navigation and to the meeting of the flour and grain examiners left for Ottawa to-day. The cost of the necessary improvements to the river is placed at $300,000.

Henry Short, a railway employee at Rat Portage, was killed by falling beneath the wheels of a moving train, from which he had jumped.

The People's Poet Dead.

An exchange says: At a ripe old age, after years of the most secluded retirement, Eliza Cook has passed away. She was the people's poet, the "woodland robin," whose song was sung for the masses. She was not peculiarly a temperance poet, yet her lays contain some beautiful thoughts on this theme:

> Traverse the desert, and then ye can tell,
> What treasures exist in the cold, deep well.

And the picture of Melaia, in his fearful flight, wrung by "maddening thirst," conjuring up "distempered visions,' how true to nature!

> I saw the crystal fountain play
> In leaping sheets of snowy spray;
> I heard the undulating wave
> Of the swift river gush and lave;
> I heard the dashing waterfall—
> Oh! it was cruel mockery all!

How like to this description are the words of one who recounts his night's experiences on the battle-field after the fearful carnage of Gettysburg: "From the wounded and the dying arose one ceaseless, far-reaching hum of groans, amid which but one word was audible. Dying men reached out wounded arms, tore up the dewy grass that they might suck the moisture. I noted that no man called for beer or brandy then. But one cry burst from gory lips—it was nature's cry for 'Water!'"

Into the silly error of shallow minds—an error which mistakes as "natural" the habit-born appetite for alcohol—Eliza Cook never fell. Her moralizing, however, is not always so correct as her knowledge of nature, for, though she can sing, in her "Song of the Goblet," of liquor imbibers that—

> The swine in the dust, or the wolf on its prey > Gave less of sheer disgust than they,

—yet she could regard the goblet as that which "can cheer or kill." We need no poet to show us the latter, and it would take quite a number of them to convince us of the former. But Eliza Cook gave the world beautiful, pure thoughts; and her words were words of freedom. She sang for the masses, and, by her death, the people will be moved to turn again to her living words. As she herself sang, so we—

> Mourn not for the dead—'tis they alone
> Who are the peaceful and the free.

An Ingenious Trick.

One of the puzzling tricks performed by so-called public mind-readers or clairvoyants is an extremely simple deception. The performer standing on the stage asks several persons in the audience to write each a sentence on a slip of paper and seal it in an envelope. Of course the stationery is furnished and afterward collected. One of the audience is a confederate and writes a sentence agreed upon beforehand. When the assistant goes through the house gathering up the envelopes the confederate's contribution is carefully put where it will be the last one of the lot to be taken up.

The performer picks out an envelope and after feeling of it with much ceremony pronounces the sentence agreed upon, and the confederate in the audience acknowledges that he wrote it. To confirm this the performer tears open the envelope and repeats the sentence as though he found it on the inclosed paper, which is in reality another man's sentence, which he reads, and then, picking up another envelope and fumbling it over, he calls out the sentence he has just read. The one who wrote it says it is right, the performer tears open the envelope, reads what is in it, and proceeds in that way through the lot.—New York Star.

Was a good Boy.

Mother—Did you break any of the rules to day, Tommy?

Tommy (first day at school)—No'm; I was a good boy. Teacher broke two, though; one on little Harry Fletcher and another on me.—Time.

A Difference in Degree.

"There was a regular cyclone up at our house this morning. Pop was mad as a hatter.'

"Well," said Johnny, ruefully, "we had a disturbance at our house, too. It wasn't a cyclone, though—sort of a spanking breeze."

—Letter carriers ought to make the best elocutionists; they have such good ideas of delivery.

Would I Were a Widow.

Young maids, you know, are voted slow,
And set aside completely,
While sprightly dames assert their claims
And smile on men too sweetly.
Who cares for youth and beauty blended?
This is the married woman's day;
The "bud's" bright reign, alas, is ended,
And only matrons hold full sway.

The married belle is versed quite well
In what we term flirtation;
Her honeyed smiles and artless wiles
Drive girls to desperation!
No wall flower is she, nowadays,
Nor treads the sober Lancers,
But joins the waltzer's giddy maze,
The merriest of the dancers!

A maid may be most fair to see,
And robed in daintiest dresses.
Know how to talk and dance the York,
Yet failure she confesses.
She murmurs: "Would I were a widow,
How delightful it would be:
In widow's weeds there's many a bidder
Would surely bid on me."

She sighs in vain, and it is plain,
Can ne'er have her desire,
For how can she, lest wedded be,
To widowhood aspire?
Her chances now are very small,
Quite slim the prop of hope beneath her,
For wives and widows have it all,
And she, poor thing, cannot be either.

Manufacture of Catsup.

One of the most wonderful manufactures of recent growth is that of catsup. A great number of factories have originated in the past ten years, and competing brands are as plentiful as those in any line of manufactured articles. Tomato catsup has conquered the world. In our younger days our mothers used to put up a supply about this time every year for winter use, and it was a condiment occasionally served at the table. Now it has taken its place with salt and pepper in daily use. Some people eat it three times a day, and many millions of gallons are required to supply the annual demand. This popularity of the catsup has made tomatoes as profitable a crop as wheat, and many farmers plant acres of vines every year just to supply the catsup factories. At 20 cents a bushel an acre of tomatoes is always profitable. The farmer simply fills his wagon bed with the ripe fruit and hauls the load to town. There is no waste, for the riper the fruit the better for the catsup, and the trade is always on the increase.

A Mathematical Puzzle.

A furniture dealer has on hand at the beginning of the year furniture valued at $4 935 55. He bought during the year $7,428 40, and sold during the year $8,420.90. Fire destroyed furniture costing $1,049, and he recovered insurance $825. His stock book at the close of the year showed furniture on hand $5,620. What was his gain or loss?—Wade's Fibre and Fabric.

Sweet Flowers.

The fairest buds are often the first to wither, and the ravages of disease make havoc with the beauty, as well as the strength and happiness of the fair sex. The prevalent disorders among American women are those of a most distressing description. These "weaknesses," as they are suggestively termed, insidiously sap the health, and the patient becomes pale and emaciated, the appetite grows fickle and feeble; she loses strength as the attacks increase in severity, and is in despair. There is relief for all such sufferers in Dr. Pierce's world-famed Favorite Prescription, which cures all "female complaints." Its use is followed by cessation of the "dragging-down" pains, return of appetite, and in due course, vigorous health.

A Disagreeable Man.

"Are you still taking painting lessons, Mamie?"

"No; I quit yesterday. I don't like my teacher"

"Why not?"

"He has such a disagreeable way of talking. He told me that if I keep on for some time longer I might be able to whitewash a fence."

Effects of Climate.

We hear a great deal said about the beneficial effect upon invalids of the climate of Colorado and other western localities, but when a man changes his place of residence in the hope of improving his health without first trying Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, he makes a great mistake. In nine cases out of ten he might save his time and money. This great remedy owes its power over all affections of the throat and lungs, bronchitis, asthma, catarrh and even consumption, which is lung scrofula, to the simple fact that it purifies and enriches the blood and invigorates the debilitated system. It is guaranteed to cure in all cases of diseases for which it is recommended, or money paid for it will be refunded.

The Proof Was Complete.

He—Do you know, Miss Brewster that I had made up my mind that you were from Boston? You have an almost perfect eastern accent.

She—Yes, and when did you discover that I was from Chicago, may I ask?

He—Just five minutes ago when you lifted your skirts out of the mud at the last crossing.

No mortal yet has e'er forecast
The moment that shall be his last, but Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets have forever settled the question of a comfortable existence until that moment does arrive, and put to flight the melancholy forebodings of sufferers from biliousness, headache, indigestion, constipation, and kindred ailments.

From our own Correspondent.

Agreeable weather as usual in this prairie country. No killing, kold, kruel frosts, yet this is the fourth day of Oct. The wild geese might have tarried a while longer instead of going south about a week ago. Who knows but each flock was in a hurry to get there first, to select localities where the snakes wont "bite" them? Rattle snakes are as fond of eggs, and chickens, as humans are, and will bite the mother hen, if she tries to protect them!

THE GOPHER

in some parts of this country, is very destructive to the grain crop. The chipmonk is "nowhere" compared to the gopher, which could carry off his monk-ship's mouth full of grain, jaws, and head, all at one trip, but there is "war waging" against this pest, and farmers say—

THE GOPHER MUST GO.

what for must he go for the poor prairie gopher pray what is the ail because he will go for the grain which we grow for for food or for sale go gopher go

Several copious showers, a little thunder and lightning since harvesting. Not a flake of snow yet, but "right smart" winds sweep over the plain, non-destructive.

"WHOA BACK"

Who, back! my good horse, don't you know what I mean,
By this exclamation? (now wonderful "green,"),
Time was when I wished you to stop, I said w...
But that was in "dark ages," long, long ago.
Now hear what I say, for time is on the wing,
And new-fangled customs, surely doth bring,
"Whoa, back, when you're going, means you must stop now."
The plain simple "whoa," but suit donkey at plow.

CAST-IRONICAL-ADVICE.

Now teamster, or driver, of team "fat or lean,"
Don't merely say "whoa," when "letting of steam,"
But when you would stop, as you "haul in the slack,"
The new-fangled use,—speak, shout it, "whoa, back"!

THE POTATO BUG

doesn't dress confortably enough in Manitoba, to live above ground in winter, therefore, (as in other countries) he digs down here, below the surface, but freezes to death—there does not sufficient snow fall on the ground to keep him "wa'm" so you see the potato bug "must go," also.

Now, Mr. Editor, put this "motley mixture" in the paper, or waste basket as seemeth you best, but tell us what became of the "confiding bird," spoken of in The Advance some months ago, which built its nest in Mr Richardson's verandah?

DIDN'T TAKE HIM LONG.—On Monday afternoon a widow lady named Mrs. Crozier came out from Priceville, intending to take the morning train from Durham, for some point in Michigan, and, we hear, had her ticket purchased. But Mr. Robert Austin, a gallant widower of this town, got his eyes on her, and thinking she would decorate and cheer his lonely home, proceeded to use those gentle persuasives suitable in such a case, and before the clock struck the midnight hour, Mrs. Crozier was Mrs. Austin, and settled in a comfortable home. SAN FRANCISCO.

LETTER NO. 2.

Californians are jealous of their country and do not like any one to say there is anything better to be found outside of it than you can get in it. Their first question on finding you are a stranger is, "How do you like this country?" They seem very much pleased if you tell them you like it, and assure you that you will enjoy the winter season if you do not the summer. Many of them have never been outside the state and know very little about Canada, and I have been asked if Ontario is a city or town. This, by well informed people in other respects.

While they are far in advance in many ways of European and Canadian cities yet they are behind the times in others. Still it is one of these things you know and feel better than you can explain. I think it is more in civil and religious rites, perhaps, that the deficiency is felt than any others. Yet when we look back and see what it sprang from, what a city of roughness, rascality and crimes, it was in the past—while today it is a city of churches, asylums, and benevolences, one cannot help being surprised at the revolution that has taken place in this respect. There is one feature noticeable and that is, that there are no wretchedly poor people seen on the streets such as you see in eastern cities.

California is a state without any Sunday laws, therefore the Sabbath desecration that goes on is scarcely to be wondered at. And when you know that the population is of such a mixed character, representatives of almost every nation under the sun with their different ideas of Sabbath keeping, you scarcely wonder at it at all.

Sunday the park is a pleasure resort for thousands and the band gives a concert every afternoon (not of sacred music). Business places all open as usual, vendors on the streets crying their wares, youths playing baseball on the commons, ladies in the window sewing or crocheting. It is the principal day for picnics, excursions and such like. Your neighbor to the right will be hanging out a washing, or have their laundry man come to take it away or bring it home, while your neighbor to the left will be doing some carpenter work around the house that he has been unable to get done on account of being at business during the week. Yet in the midst of all this you find many fine Christian churches well filled with earnest workers, having broader and more advanced views in regard to the religion of Jesus Christ and more zeal in the cause than those who are living in better kept Sabbath lands.

Now that you have learned something about the city and its people, I shall try and take you around in imagination and let you see some of its interesting sights. To do so we shall take a cable car and glide swiftly and easily up hill and down hill, enjoying many varied views from the hill tops. While doing so find out all we can about this new mode of travelling. These cars go up hills that are almost impossible for horses to get up. There is no vehicle attached. These cars are divided into two parts. One part is similar to any closed street car. The other is open, having seats running along the sides with a passage in the centre where the man who works the car stands. This part is called the dummy. The road is also similar to any street car track with the exception of an open space of about an inch in the centre. Underneath the track a cable wire is laid of about an inch and a half in diameter, consisting of twisted steel cords. This is one continuous rope from engine house to end of road and return. The longest cable road in the city is Howard st., which has just been completed, the cable wire being twenty-three miles long. The man who works the car is called the grip man. He works the grip, which passes through the bottom of the car and then through the space in the centre of the track and clasps the cable rope, and thus the car is propelled. When he wishes to stop the carhe lets go of t he grip, it likewise lets go of the rope, and the car stops. They run at the rate of six or seven miles an hour when heavily loaded, and run on time to the half minute. Now that you know something of how you are to travel we shall take a car and visit the Golden Gate park, passing on our way the magnificent grounds and mansions of the millionaires Flood, Crocker, Fair, Stanford and Hopkins on Nob Hill. This is a sight in itself. Reaching the park, however, we alight and passing through an arched gateway take one of the many winding paths which soon brings us to a grotto with its roof covered with artificial icicles. Just at the entrance to our right is a large pond with a fountain playing in the centre, beautiful plants of all kinds growing in and around it, with ducks swimming on it. This park is only about seven years old and is certainly a lovely and wonderful spot. Formerly it was comprised of sand banks of the finest white beach sand. It is ten miles long and one wide, and from three to four miles are under cultivation. This ground had to be planted with grass and shrubs to form a foundation or ground to work on. Now it contains fine drives and walks, beautiful grass plats, flower beds of every design, arbors, artificial mounds, rustic seats, and a fine conservatory in which may be seen trees, flowers and plants of every clime. These are beyond description. In looking at them you will have brought before your mind pictures of flowers you have seen in cards when you have thrown them aside and thought, such flowers as that represents never grew. There you will be surprised to find the "fac simile" of them growing. In a large pond may be seen pink, white and purple water lilies growing. Foliage plants of which the leaves are so thin and the veining so delicately traced as to almost force one to believe they were skeletonized leaves that were placed there. Then the wonders of nature seem to impress you more than ever, and above all what a wonderful god ours is. Here, too, may be seen growing the banana tree, laden with fruit, and palm trees of every kind towering above you, until their tops touch the roof of the building. Coming again to the outside we pass life size statues of General Hallock, Garfield, and Francis Scott Key, author of "Star Spangled Banner." At the foot of the latter has been seen the music and words of this song growing in flowers. The band stand is also worthy of notice, as it is quite picturesque, being built in the form of a shell, the tinting and shading resembling that of the inside. Here music is discoursed every Saturday and Sunday afternoon the year around. A portion of this park is exclusively for children. Play grounds, building with every convenience for eating, drinking and resting. There are goats, donkeys and merry-go-rounds. The deer park must not be overlooked. This is considerable of a ravine enclosed, in which can be seen several deer feeding. You cannot help but liken it to the Garden of Eden, and one is loth to leave so charming a spot. However, we must hasten on, take the dummy (this is a little steam car) and visit Sutro Heights. This is four or five miles further on at the entrance of the park, and right on the ocean. On our way for miles we will see tufts of grass half a foot apart growing in the white beach sand. This has all been planted. Then again hills of this sand without a speck on it to change the nature of the surface. This grass planting is such an enormous undertaking that one can scarcely realize how it would be possible for it to be undertaken. Yet year after year they are extending this park and making such ground as this.

Sutro Heights is the beautiful private grounds of Mr. Adolph Sutro, which are open to the public.

HOW CRONIN DIED.

The Story of the Murder as Told by Burke in Winnipeg.

WHAT THE AUTOPSY REVEALED.

A Winnipeg despatch says: Burke, the Cronin suspect, is said to have confessed to his fellow-prisoners while in jail here his connection with the Cronin crime. One of these men is Heffer, who has just been released on a charge of manslaughter. Heffer's statement is said to be most circumstantial, giving names, date and minute details. He says Burke told him that Dr. Cronin was murdered in the Carlson cottage on the night of May 4th, and that he was present at the commission of the deed, together with a number of others, whose names he gave. After the murder was committed the conspirators put the remains in a box and took them to the lake shore in an express waggon. They threw the box into the lake, but it would not sink and drifted ashore, so they put it back into the waggon and took it to the city and hid it for the night. On the following night they set forth again, intending to sink the box containing the remains into the lake by means of weights, but becoming suddenly panic-stricken with the fear of capture they dropped the body into a manhole and threw the box into a vacant lot, where it was found on the following day. Burke mentioned the names of those ordering the commission of the crime and those taking part in it, and he also told who it was who paid him money to leave Chicago and go to Europe by Winnipeg. Those names Heffer gave to his lawyers. The story throughout is most circumstantial. This fact it is that leads to the strong belief in its truthfulness entertained by those who are fully acquainted with it. The story also corroborates exactly the statements by Gillette and Mills, two other prisoners. Heffer says he is willing to go to Chicago and give evidence in the matter. The authorities here have notified the State authorities at Chicago of these statements by Gillette, Mills and Heffer, but have not as yet heard anything in reply.

A last (Thuraday) night's Chicago despatch says: The Cronin trial formally began this morning. The court-room was crowded. State's Attorney Longenecker at once began his opening address to the jury. He said—The evidence that we shall introduce will be to show a conspiracy to murder Dr. Cronin. The evidence we shall introduce will be that in the conspiracy which was formed and carried into execution, terminating in the killing of Dr. Cronin, all the conspirators are liable for murder, and that the punishment for conspiracy ends in the punishment for murder. That is the position we take in this case. The same hidden hand that worked and moved this conspiracy, that concocted this scheme, was again working in this community to lead the people to believe that Cronin was still alive. Not content with having beaten out his life, not content with having laid him to rest in a sewer, the same conspirators that brought it about were again at work for the purpose of blasting the character and reputation of the man they had murdered.

The State's Attorney proceeded to speak of the motive of the crime, and said that in order to show what that motive was it became necessary to examine into the history in this country of the organization known as the United Brotherhood, commonly called the Clan-na-Gael. Before doing this he reminded the jury that they were not trying the Clan-na-Gael, but the prisoners at the bar. Mr. Longenecker then proceeded to sketch the history of the Clan-na-Gael in this country, saying it was made up of patriotic Irishmen, Irishmen who went into it for political effect and Irishmen who went into it for the money there was in it, and that its object was to free Ireland by force of arms as soon as a favorable opportunity offered. He declared that the Triangle was supreme; that the oaths of the members made their commands superior to the laws of the nation.

Mr. Forrest objected to this line of statement. Judge McConnell warned the State's Attorney that he was making these statements at his peril.

The State's Attorney said he would prove what he had said, and he accepted the responsibility. He proceeded to say that when Sullivan, Feely and Boland got control of the Executive Board they changed the plan of work of the organization, inaugurated the dynamite policy and implanted in the constitution the clause commanding perfect and unquestioning obedience to the commands of the Board.

The defence again took an exception to this line of statement.

The State's Attorney then spoke of the adoption of the Triangle as the symbol of the Executive Board. The membership did not know who constituted the Triangle, so secret was it, but nevertheless they obeyed its orders, and were sent on various special missions in England in the way of active work and under assumed names. Notwithstanding this secrecy those men were betrayed by the Board to the English authorities, and twenty of them are now in prison. This was, he declared, to enable the Board to steal the funds, and when at last a showing was made the Board claimed that the Order owed them $13,000, while there was $250,000 in the treasury when they took charge. Several witnesses were then examined.

A Friday's Chicago despatch says: Dr. Egbert stated the facts revealed by the autopsy which he made upon Dr. Cronin's body on the day following its discovery. He described the wounds, and gave it as his opinion that death resulted from them. All the wounds were upon the head. The skull was not broken, except a small piece of bone was chipped off at the corner of the left eye. The witness described the condition of the internal organs, and exhibited the stomach and its contents to the lawyers and the jury. Dr. Egbert said the stomach seemed to contain only vegetables. Among them he distinguished corn, and there were others which resembled cabbage and carrots. In his judgment the doctor was killed within three hours after having eaten.

The cross-examination of Dr. Egbert developed that none of the wounds on the corpse were such as would necessarily cause death. It was impossible also, the doctor admitted, to say whether the wounds were inflicted before or after death. He had tried to ascertain, but was unable to do so. He had not ascertained that the wounds affected any important nerves or arteries, and he could not swear that they in any manner affected the brain. If death had resulted from the skull wounds, it would in all probability have been caused by concussion of the brain. The usual post mortem evidence of such a result, the heart and the lungs being filled with blood, was not found in this case.

The question was put—"Is it not scientifically true that you physicians found no evidences in that body that were certain and conclusive of the form of death?"

Dr. Egbert replied—"That is true." Dr. Egbert was of the opinion that death had occurred through excessive loss of blood, but there was no certainty of it, he said.

Dr. Charles W. Perkins, who at the request of Dr. Egbert assisted at the post mortem, testified that in his opinion death did not ensue from blood-letting, but from concussion of the brain. The latter organ was too decomposed to afford any information.

The last witness of the day was the undertaker who removed the body after the post mortem, and who testified that it remained in his charge until buried.

CRAZED SAILORS,

After Seventeen Days' Starvation, Bend the Body of a Dead Comrade.

A Baltimore despatch says: Carl Graves, fireman, and Ludwig Loder, seaman, survivors of the crew of the steamship Earnmoor, tell a horrible story of the way they sustained life by cannibalism for days. Loder says: The only food we had the first 15 days in the boat was a flying fish and a few raw small birds divided among 11 men. The sixteenth day Wm. Davis, a seaman, caught me by the throat and made a dash at my head with a knife. He cut me on the right cheek, the scar from which still remains. He was told to kill me by August Plagge, a fireman. When Davis began to cut me, some of my companions caught him, while others shouted "Kill him! Kill him! We want something to eat; we are starving." Plagge, Davis and others in one end of the boat decided that I should die. As I was pretty fat, I suppose they thought I looked inviting. Plagge was placed on watch that night, but he was missing the next morning. No one saw him go overboard. On the 17th day Wm. Robinson lay down to sleep. When they called him they found he was dead. It was determined to eat his flesh, and William Wright, the cook, was ordered to carve the body. The first thing done was to smash in Robinson's skull, and from the fracture each one sucked the blood as long as it lasted, which was but a little while. Then the cook stripped the flesh from the ribs. The next day the flesh in strips was placed on the top of water-tight compartments and dried in the sun. After taking out Robinson's liver, heart and other parts which would furnish blood to be sucked, they threw his mutilated body into the sea. Two days after Robinson's death third engineer Thomas Hunt died. His body was also cut up for food. "In about three days," said Loder, "the limbs and feet of all began to swell, and several have since broken out in ugly sores. We think it is poison from the human flesh and blood." Graves and Loder say they have no recollection of the taste of human flesh, so great was their mental anguish at the time.

THE LAST OF LUIS.

Funeral of the Late King of Portugal.

A Lisbon despatch says: The funeral of King Luis took place yesterday. The cortege started at 2 30, and the funeral car was completely covered with beautiful wreaths. Another carriage was devoted to floral offerings. Following were carriages containing the representatives of Germany, England, France and Turkey, and the royal mourners. The last carriage was occupied by King Carlos, the Duke of Aosta, and the Duke of Montpensier. The cortege, which was followed by a large number of deputations from trade and other societies, arrived at the Pantheon at 4 p.m. The Papal nuncio, the diplomatic body, and the members of the royal household were in waiting in the St. Vincent Church. The remains were blessed by the patriarch, and 101 guns announced that the body had been consigned to the tomb.

Queen Pia and the Duchess of Aosta, accompanied by maids of honor, visited the Pantheon and remained a long time in silent prayer. The widow placed on the coffin a wreath inscribed: "A souvenir of the soul and heart and of the eternal love of thy inconsolable wife in death and life, Maria."

The Duke of Edinburgh was unwell, and was forbidden by his doctors to attend the funeral. He therefore sent an officer to represent him. Towards evening the Duke improved.

Probably a Case of Revenge.

A Montreal despatch of Sunday says: On Monday night last a freight train on the Canada Atlantic Railway bound east ran into a siding at St. Justin, and eight cars were badly smashed, entailing a loss to the company of $15,000. Investigation showed some one had misplaced the switch and fixed the light signalling the road was clear. Private Detective Grose, of Montreal, was sent for by the company for the purpose of ferreting out the perpetrator of the outrage. His inquiries have led to the arrest of A. Beauchamp, a discharged employee. The evidence shows that Beauchamp, since his discharge, has been indulging in threats against the company, and it will be shown that he was in the vicinity of the place of the accident on Monday night. He was arrested at Casselman and lodged in jail.

Investigating an Unlucky Find.

A Franklin, Pa., despatch of Friday evening says: A number of school children found a bomb loaded with dynamite near the school-house on the Galloway farm, near here, this evening. While attempting to open it with a knife it exploded, with terrible results. Two children, named Fitzgerald and Roger, are fatally hurt, while eight others are in a serious condition. Fitzgerald's arm was blown off and his face was terribly disfigured. Roger's right eye was blown out and his face horribly lacerated. The others are cut about the head and body by the fragments of the bomb, which had been made by some one for the purpose of killing fish.

DRYING DYNAMITE!

That Was the Experiment Montreal Sewer Workers Tried,

WITH STARTLING RESULTS.

A Thursday's Montreal despatch says: A terrible dynamite explosion occurred in St. Jean Baptiste ward early this morning. The city is constructing a sewer on Pantaleon street and considerable blasting is necessary. About 6 o'clock the blacksmith's assistant, Jules Chartrand, went to light his fire, and at the same hour Godefroi Filion, the man in charge of the explosives and blasting, also went to kindle a small furnace or hall stove in his shanty for the purpose of drying two cartridges which had not been used the previous day, but had the exploder and fuse attached ready for use as soon as the operations commenced at 7 o'clock. What occurred is told by Pierre Filion, foreman of the works: "The fire was kindled to soften and dry the two cartridges, which were placed at some distance from the stove. There were forty cartridges besides in the shanty, each about ten inches in length and an inch and a quarter thick. When the fire was fairly started I opened the stove to put in more coal, and my idea is that at that moment a spark must have fallen upon the fuses. Anyway, I suddenly perceived that the fuses were all ablaze, and, seeing that an explosion had got to come, I rushed out for my life, and had hardly gone a few yards from the building when the awful explosion took place. As already stated, Jules Chartrand was then in the blacksmith's shop, and the unfortunate man was hurled into the air, to what height no one seems to know, and fell a corpse to the ground about thirty feet off." Dr. Jette, who was first on the ground, found life extinct, but the body still warm. His impression was that death was instantaneous. The body was completely naked, nothing remaining but the boots, and the stockings themselves had been torn off at the junction of the boots. The shock was distinctly felt in the upper part of the city. Houses shook, windows rattled and people were awakened from their slumbers. A number of persons received serious injuries from broken glass and debris thrown by the explosion. Along Laval avenue and Pantaleon street there is not a single house but has window glass broken. The damage increases as the scene of the disaster is approached, and the blocks forming the corner of Laval avenue and St. Jean Baptiste street have hardly a single pane of glass left. The same may be said of Pantaleon street, but where the destruction is greatest is in a large block at the corner of Pantaleon and St. Jean Baptiste streets, immediately facing the scene of the accident. This house, which belongs to Mr. Plouffe, butcher, looks as if it had been undergoing a bombardment for several hours. Not a single pane of glass is left in the windows, the blinds have been torn off, some of the doors almost wrenched from their hinges, the inside walls are falling in in many places and the whole presents a most dilapidated appearance. There are about eight tenements in this block and the occupants had to seek new lodgings wherein to pass the night, as it did not seem safe to remain on the premises. The spot where the dynamite shed stood is now marked by a large hole, some ten feet in diameter and six feet deep, instantaneously dug out by the explosion. The spot where poor Chartrand fell is marked by a small pool of blood, in which lies a piece of torn clothing, probably a vest. As to the shop and shanties, with their contents, all that remains of them can be seen in the shape of almost imperceptible fragments, scattered for acres around the scene of the explosion. A piece of the bellows in the blacksmith's shop is the only thing to which a form can be ascribed. Jules Chartrand, the unfortunate victim of this accident, was a young man only 21 years of age. He had been married two years, and leaves his wife with twin babies only a few months old.

SMALLPOX AT PELEE.

The Inhabitants of Surrounding Townships Getting Alarmed.

Kingsville, Gosfield, Leamington and Mersea have issued proclamations calling upon ratepayers to get vaccinated. Medical men have been hired to go to each schoolhouse. McKee, the school teacher, who nursed Snyder, is down with the disease, and according to his own statements he was in Windsor on Wednesday last. The evening previous he escaped from the island in a small boat and landed in Harrow. Wednesday morning he took the early train for Walkerville, and then crossed to Detroit. That evening he went to Windsor, took the Michigan Central train for Amherstburg, and then hired a rig from Albert Fox, of Amherstburg, and drove to Harrow, returning with the boat to the island. Another case developed yesterday, and the inhabitants of the island are panic stricken. Captain McCormick, who, died, has been sickly all summer, and he attended Dr. Snyder. His father, A. M. McCormick, and brother, Norman McCormick, are also down with the disease, and it is feared that it will break out in some of the villages on the lake front.

France's Underground River.

A London cable says: The subterranean river recently discovered in France, in the Miers District of the Department of Lot, has now been traced a distance of seven miles to a point beyond which the three daring explorers who undertook the task did not dare to venture, as the river there takes an abrupt plunge into the bowels of the earth to a depth impossible to fathom. It took three days and nights to accomplish this journey of seven miles and return, the greater portion being done in a folding boat made of sailcloth. Miers is in the heart of a wild and mountainous country, in the deepest recesses of which caves and grottoes are found, some of which appear to have been the abode of our troglodyte ancestors. The subterranean river was first discovered a month ago at the bottom of an abyss known as the pit of Padarac and was then traced a distance of two miles. The whole seven miles so far explored are in utter darkness except at the point where the river was discovered. It abounds in cascades and passes through a succession of grottoes sparkling with stalactites. Preparations are being made for further explorations.

FIRE AFLOAT.

The Steamer Quinte Destroyed and Four Lives Lost.

A Deseronto despatch of Wednesday says: The steamer Quinte was burned about three miles from Deseronto on her way to Picton about 6 o'clock this evening. Four persons are supposed to have been lost, Capt. Christie's mother, his young brother Charles, the ladies' maid and her young son, named Davern, of Trenton. As far as can be ascertained the passengers were all saved. Three or four have severe burns, but the doctors report none seriously injured. Many were chilled by being in the water. All the survivors have been brought to Deseronto and are being properly cared for. The fire, it is supposed, started in the furnace room and spread quickly to the whole boat. The captain ran her ashore only a short distance away, where she lies almost entirely destroyed. All the freight, baggage, etc., were burned. The steamer belonged to the Rathbun Company.

The Quinte was the largest boat of the Deseronto Navigation Company. She had been, three years ago, made nearly new. She was valued at $18,000, partly covered by insurance. The steamer is burnt to the water's edge, leaving the hull and machinery in fairly good shape. She lies in shallow water. Capt. T. Donnelly said he never inspected a boat that had such a fine fire apparatus as the steamer Quinte. He inspected her last May.

Capt. Christie's mother and his 12-year-old brother were unable to leave the ladies' cabin, so dense was the smoke and rapid the flames. Mrs. Stacey, the helper to the cook, and her little son were in the dining-room and were unable to get out. Fireman Thomas Hart had his right leg badly sprained and bones broken. He was also severely burned. Engineer Short lost $200 in money in his trunk. One of the passengers, Mr. Hart, of Belleville, lost his overcoat and a purse with $40. The crew lost everything.

Mrs. Christie was 50 years of age and a resident of Picton. Her son, the captain, is about 24 years of age, and has been on steamboats for some time.

Another name may have to be added to the list of the lost, as a man named George Robinson, of Picton, was to take the boat for that place last evening, and nothing can be learned of him. The fire leaped rapidly from deck to deck and, although the firemen were quickly out of the fire-hole they were compelled by the advance of the flames to hurry to the promenade deck, then to the hurricane deck, from which they were forced to jump into the water. The steamer Deseronto was soon at the scene of the disaster and conveyed the remains of the dead to Deseronto. She afterwards made the Quinte's trip to Picton.

Mr. Ralston said: We were about three miles from Deseronto a half a mile or so from shore; we were at tea, and heard someone calling out "The boat is on fire"; I rushed to the cabin and put my coat on; the smoke was intense; heard a woman cry out "Will somebody save me and the baby"; I then caught hold of a chair and with it smashed three of the windows in the cabin, and got out, I don't know how; the first thing I realized was that I was outside of the cabin, climbing between the windows, with the chair in my hand; some one said to me, "Give me the chair and I will throw it in the water"; I told them that I required it, as I could not swim; I crawled along near the water wheel, caught hold of a rope and let myself down, hand over hand, until I reached the water; the flames had made such rapid headway that the rope that was sustaining me was burned through, and I was precipitated into the bay; my chair then stood me in good stead, as with it I managed to paddle along to a brace underneath the boat; I caught hold of that and held my chair underneath me; I called out loudly for help; fortunately my cries were heard by the captain who, with another man, came in a row boat; they came within 30 or 40 feet of where I was, but the heat from the burning vessel was so intense that they could not come nearer; the flag pole of the Quinte had burned off and was swimming close to me; it was being propelled towards me by the captain and the other man, and I assisted in guiding it towards me by means of the chair; I caught hold of the end of the pole; they called out, "Have you a secure hold?" I replied in the affirmative; they pulled me shoreward as fast as they could row; I was very much exhausted, and taken at once to Deseronto, where I was attended by the physicians; my opinion is that the fuel being used on the boat was not what it should be; it consisted of light pine cuttings from saw mills in that section; a pile of this stuff in the fire hold became ignited and before it could be extinguished the steamer was in flames. I believe that not more than five minutes elapsed between the time of the breaking out of the fire, until the vessel was doomed; nobody said a word about life preservers; not a cabin passenger knew of the existence of such an accommodation; had they been reminded of them by the crew, I think the result would have been different.

The Baker Heirs' Foolish Hunt.

It has cost twelve hundred or so persons of Western Pennsylvania and Ohio an average of ten dollars apiece for the privilege of finding what a hollow mockery was their heirship in $500,000,000 worth of land, mostly lying in the city of Philadelphia. Somehow the report started that Colonel Henry Baker, a Philadelphia revolutionary soldier, left 600 acres of land all now inside the city, and these twelve hundred people satisfactorily proved to themselves and to each other that they were heirs to the property, to get which they hired certain lawyers at a cost of $12,000. Search revealed the fact that Philadelphia had never furnished the revolutionary army with a Colonel Henry Baker, and that there wasn't any Baker estate. This is about the way all the claims for fortunes in England turn out, though the claimants of alleged English estates do not get off so cheaply as did the Baker heirs.—Rochester Herald.

Time Would Tell.

Patient—Great heavens, young man, that's pretty strong medicine!

Young Doctor—Yes; it's very powerful. Sometimes it cures and sometimes it kills.

Patient—Well—I say—here, young man, is there any danger in my case?

Young Doctor—I can't tell for an hour yet, Mr. Moneybags. Now calm yourself.

GAMBLING AND DRINK.

A Former Chathamite's Devotion to Them Leads to a Sad End.

A Butte, Mont., despatch of Sunday says: This city was shocked to-day by the sensational suicide of N. W. Wilson, ticket agent in the Northern Pacific Railway office here. Wilson was a popular young man in both business and social circles. He was a Canadian. In November, 1886, Wilson came to Montana at the instance of Major J. E. Dawson, of the Montana Central. Before coming here Wilson was Grand Trunk ticket agent at Windsor, Ont. He has also occupied a position as ticket agent and station master at Woodstock and Ingersoll, Ont. For some years he was relieving agent along the line of the Great Western before its amalgamation with the Grand Trunk. He was a man of unusual ability, and until recently of very correct habits, but he fell a prey to prevailing vices in this city. Wilson had been drinking for the past three days heavily, and while doing so had gambled at different places in the city. He had the entire confidence of General Agent McCaig, and it was his habit to take the ticket receipts from the office each day and buy drafts at the bank to remit to the Northern Pacific at St. Paul. Wilson made his appearance at the office every morning in his usual condition and McCaig suspected nothing. He discovered this morning, however, that for the last three days Wilson had not remitted as usual. Last night Wilson played faro and lost about $600. He had played in the house before and his cheques were accepted. This morning Wilson went to the Northern Pacific office as usual and was at his desk when Mr. McCaig came in. Shortly after the arrival of McCaig at the office a representative of the First National Bank came in and told Mr. McCaig that a number of cheques had come in signed by Wilson in favor of gambler Dowd, and they had been thrown out. Wilson heard the remark and turned pale. Mr. McCaig called Wilson's attention to the fact and Wilson said he would go out and buy the drafts at once. This occurred at 10 o'clock. Mr. McCaig knew Wilson had no money to buy the drafts, so he went and informed Wilson's friends of the deficit, and they readily agreed to endorse his notes and square him with the company. P. L. Foster, who roomed with Wilson, heard of the trouble and went to his room about 7 o'clock. The door was locked and Wilson inside. Wilson evidently thought the officers were coming to arrest him. He swallowed four ounces of chloroform and shot himself through the head, and died in twenty minutes. The jury returned a verdict of suicide. The remains will be sent to Chatham for burial.

WHISKEY AND THE PIPE

Lead an Old Pensioner to a Terrible Death at Windsor.

A Windsor despatch of Wednesday says: Wm. Brown, an aged British pensioner, was burned to death in the Essex House stable fire last night. About 9 o'clock one of the boarders of the hotel saw a small flame in the loft of the barn. An alarm was turned in, and in an incredibly short space of time the fire department was on the spot, but the fire had gained such headway that the whole upper part of the barn was in flames. During the progress of the fire the question what caused it was often asked, but no one could give the slightest clue until about 7.30. When a fireman was going through the burning building he stumbled over something, and looking down he saw it was the body of a man. Grabbing the body he dragged it to the open air, where, upon investigation, it was found to be Wm. Brown. Nearly all of his clothes were burned off, and the face and one side of his body was burnt to a crisp. The dead man has for years earned a precarious living in Windsor, and has often figured in the Police Court as a common drunk. Last evening, shortly before the fire, he was seen near the barns considerably under the influence of liquor, and it is supposed that he lit his pipe and lay down on the hay, causing the conflagration, and being too drunk he could not save himself.

WITH WINCHESTER RIFLES.

Kentucky Factions Attempt the Settlement of an Old Feud.

A Louisville, Ky., despatch of Wednesday says: An engagement has occurred between the Howard and Turner factions near Harlan Court House. James Deane, of Howard's party, was killed and five others were wounded. Three of the Turner crowd were wounded. A correspondent at Pineville telegraphs as follows: Wilson Howard and one of his principal henchmen named Jennings are among the wounded, and it is said Howard's injuries are probably fatal. The Turners have been in possession of the town for more than a week. Their leader is John Turner, aged 17. Howard's forces have been in camp one mile from town. There are about forty men in each crowd, all equipped with Winchesters and revolvers. Yesterday morning Turner led his followers in an attack on the Howard camp. The attacking party got in the first work, but were finally driven back to town. A report reached Pineville to-day that the Howard forces in Harlan, enraged by the battle of yesterday and the probable fatal wounding of their leader, left camp last night and started for Harlan Court House, intending to kill everybody that belongs to the opposition and burn the town.

Big Strike of Miners.

A Columbus, O., despatch says: About 700 miners employed by the Columbus and Hocking Coal and Iron Company in the Hocking Valley have struck. They are progressive union men. About 400 Knights of Labor remain at work. The union men refuse to work unless their organization is recognized in the committee and the cheque for mine expenses granted as before May 1st.

MR. STEVENS, who circled the globe on his bicycle and then set out on a hunt for Stanley in the heart of Africa, has returned to Zanzibar a sadder and a wiser man. He distributed loads of cotton goods and other stuff he took along with him to bribe his way through the country, and brought back with him malarial fever, but no news of the man he was in search of. He did not even hear Stanley's name once mentioned.

Whar the Corn Juice Flows.

My son, afore you leave your home I want ter say to you,
Thar's lots of pitfalls in the world to let young roosters through;
So keep a padlock on your mouth and skin your weather eye,
But never advertise yourself as being monstrous "fly."
Don't run to dress—of all the sorts with which the world is strewed
The most consarned useless thing is what they call a dood;
An' don't be "tough" an' wear your hat a tilted on your nose,
An' don't be forever loafin'
Whar the corn juice flows

I know you think I don't know much, but take a fool's advice
An' never go to a saloon to play at cards or dice,
For, tho' I don't hold play at cards itself is any crime,
I know those bar-room games use up a heap of cash an' time;
An' every little while, you know, the reg'lar drinks will come,
Until your head goes swimmin' on a reservoir of rum;
Sometimes you'll jaw about the game, and likely come to blows,
For ye don't know what will happen
Whar the corn juice flows.

They say the wise man takes his drink and goes about his biz,
Tho' I think he is a wiser one who lets it be whar 'tis.
Still, bar-room talk an' sich does more than drink ter spoil a man,
For the mind absorbs more poison than the stomach ever can;
So ef ye will indulge, my lad, don't hang about the bar,
But down your booze an' plank your dues an' get away from thar;
For, barrin' liquor-men themselves, thar's no one ever runs
That made it his headquarters
Whar the corn juice flows.

I s'pose this kinder talk from me may sound a little odd,
Bein' as how I've allus drank my share of forty-rod;
But if I had to live again the years thet's passed an' gone
I'd undertake to organize a temperance club of one;
For now that you are leavin' home ter steer yer own canoe,
Some theories I have allus held is sorter fallin' through,
An' I feel a good deal better of my son afore he goes
Would boycott all the places
Whar the corn juice flows.

He Touched Their Hearts.

It was a touching story which the late Lord Shaftesbury told of some of the greatest roughs in the east end of London. A young clergyman in one of the most wretched parishes had asked his advice as to how to deal with the terrible human vice and misery of the place. Lord Shaftesbury had counseled him to begin by establishing a ragged school, and had at the same time furnished the necessary funds. The school met with immediate success, but it was impossible, in spite of all the vicar's efforts, to induce the people to come to church, and the young clergyman finally resolved to meet them by preaching in the open air. He selected one of the worst courts, and had the benches from the school taken there for his hearers to sit upon, but was dismayed when he came upon the scene to see the front row occupied by a number of the most notorious roughs of the neighborhood, who, he made no doubt, had come to break up the services. To his surprise, however, everything went off quietly, and when the services were over he stepped up to the leader of the gang, told him he had not expected to see him there, though he was very glad to welcome him, and asked him what had brought him. The man said:

"Well, sir, you've been very good to our little kids, so I said to my mates: 'Parson's going to preach in ——— court on Sunday night. It's a roughish place. Let's go and see fair play.' That's what brought us."—Boston Journal.

South Dakota's Capital.

Pierre is a fine, well-built town of about 5,000 people and six banks, full of enterprise and activity, and before the capital boom set in had been waiting eagerly for the opening of the great Sioux Reservation on the opposite side of the river It is comparatively a few years since a couple of Chicago young men who learned of its situation conceived it an opportunity to make money, and they spent their last penny in the purchase of a carload of stoves and hardware. When it reached Pierre they had nothing left to pay the freight bill with, but they saw an amiable-looking old fellow on the street and they told him their story. He went with them to the depot, paid their bill of $250, and they established themselves in a shedded corral, and were soon doing a rushing trade, at a profit of about 800 per cent. In those days the aristocracy of Pierre and its ruling element were all saloon-keepers. But the scenes that then made it a terror to all peaceably disposed persons had so completely disappeared before the present excitement set in that for half a year there had not been a single prisoner in the handsome jail until a "drunk and disorderly" was locked up a few days ago for 60 days. Then, too, three or four years ago the people of Pierre built a poor house, but it secured only three inmates in as many years, and cost only $150 for maintenance.—Special to Philadelphia Record.

A Familiar Flavor.

Mr. Deeds—Thirsty? Try this water. That's another advantage of the house. That there's a splendid cistern; bound to be full when every well in the neighborhood dries up. You'd never get such a complete establishment for the money if it hadn't been for the death of the owner.

Prospective Purchaser (stopping to expectorate)—Did you bury him in the cistern?

A Valuable Talent.

Seedy Individual—Say, can't you take me with you out West and give me a job?

Chicago Business Man—What can you do?

Seedy Individual—When I'm well dressed I can borrow more money on less credit than any man in the city.

Chicago Business Man—By Jinks! Come right along. I'll take you into partnership.

No Cards.

Ethel—Why, mamma, I would as soon think of marrying papa as marrying old General Starbuckle.

Ethel's mother—Well, I married your father, and I guess you are no better than I am.

The wife of a prominent farmer and politician of Pennsylvania gave birth yesterday to a quartette of babies. This is the kind of an infant industry that needs pap.

The late King of Portugal was a corpulent man of 50, with a dark complexion and a grave face. An American who saw him recently says he bore a striking resemblance to ex-President Cleveland. His son, who succeeds him as Carlos I., is very different from the father physically, being very light in complexion. He is an ambitious young man, not possessing the quiet scholarly tastes of the late Luis. He is anxious to become prominent in European politics. In all his mental characteristics he more resembles his mother than his father.

Hon. C. F. Fraser, chatting with a Brockville Recorder representative about court matters, stated that he had not accepted a brief in a criminal case, since the time he entered the Ontario Cabinet. When Mr. Fraser was handling cases of a criminal nature he had the reputation of being one of the cleverest lawyers in that line in Canada, and no doubt had he continued that practice would have been very much better off to-day. Politics has a fascination for those who follow it, but with men of the stamp of Mr. Fraser, and some other prominent men on both sides, it is a losing game financially.

The Duke and Duchess of Connaught leave India in March next and will return home by way of Ceylon, China, Japan and Canada, probably arriving in England in June. It will be six years on November 26th since His Royal Highness first took a divisional command in India. This he held until September 26th, 1885. He went out again in September, 1886, to take up a divisional appointment, and has been commander-in-chief of the Madras army since December 14th, 1886. It will be ten years in May next since His Royal Highness became a general officer, and twenty-two in June since he joined the Royal Engineers as a subaltern.

The supply of natural gas in the Pittsburg district is not inexhaustible; in fact, the gas is already too scarce to meet the demand. This state of affairs was first noticed the latter part of last winter, but the coming of warm weather relieved the pressure for domestic surposes, and nothing was heard of a shortage during the summer months. But with the first appearance of a change of temperature this fall the trouble recommenced in an aggravated form. The last move of the natural gas companies has been to ask the big mills to run only at night, when the demand upon the fuel for other purposes would be slight. Many of the establishments have decided to return to the use of coal, and some have already done so.

Less than fifteen years ago the different branches of the Presbyterian family in Canada entered into union. None of all who took part in the services of that memorable 15th of June, 1875, expected better results than have been actually achieved. Their fears have been disappointed and their hopes amply realized. In regard to finance, the income has risen from $982,000 in 1876 to $1,942,000 in 1888. These figures indicate a vast amount of activity in missions at home and abroad, in educational work, in congregational work. Since the union large additions have been made to the number of Presbyteries, indicating the vastness of the field occupied. There are Presbyteries of Columbia, Regina, Brandon, Calgary, Minnedosa, Honan—names of which little or nothing was known fifteen years ago.

The Hungarians have never been credited with being a very progressive sort of people, yet they have introduced a system in their railway service which bids fair to revolutionize railway travel the world over. The Government owns and controls the railways, and it has established fourteen zones which have their centre in Buda-Pesth. The fare from the capital to all stations within zone A is placed at $1, to all those within zone B at $2 and thus on to zone N at proportional rates. So far the result has been satisfactory to the public and the Government also. The cost of travel has decreased enormously. Trips, it is said, which formerly cost 25 can now be made for 8 florins, yet the Government, instead of losing, has gained by the change, as it carries three times the number of passengers it previously did. As a matter of fact, the crowds of people travelling by rail put the Government at their wits' end to provide the necessary accommodation. This step in advance, great though it be, is only the preliminary to a still greater one. The authorities intend ultimately to transport passengers as letters are now carried, at a uniform rate to and from all parts of the kingdom. Yet people talk about the effete East.

Mr. Twitter—After the electricians have prepared the way for them, my dear.

It has often been reported that the British army is largely composed of undersized boys instead of stalwart men, but the returns do not bear out these statements. Of 202,761 men only 11,569 are under 19 years of age, while 34 per cent. are over 5 feet 8 inches in height.

GATES AT CROSSINGS.

Continued Trials Confirm the Stability of a Baltimore Invention.

At the trial of the Toulmin electrical gates on the 4th instant at the Woodbrook station, Maryland Central Railroad, a single track road, says the Baltimore News, it was shown that the gates were closed by the train when distant from the crossing a quarter of a mile or more, and were opened again automatically by the train while going over the crossing; that when the gates were up the train might be run backwards or forwards over the crossing without interfering with them. Also, that the gates were closed only by trains going towards the crossing and were not operated by trains after they had passed it. It was also demonstrated that the electrical connections are exceedingly simple, and of a character to act perfectly under all conditions of the weather, and at any rate of speed at which the cars might be going. It was admitted by the railroad engineers and officials present that the invention is a practical success, and that the fearful loss of life at railroad crossings, amounting to an average of 360 persons a year, might be prevented by the general adoption of these gates by railroads throughout the country. The gates at Woodbrook station have been in successful operation for the past four or five weeks.

Who Owns the United States?

In spite of the rapid increase in the number of millionaires in the United States in recent years, the popular notion is that wealth is yet very much more evenly distributed in this country than in England. Mr. Thos. G. Shearman, the well-known New York statistician, has been engaged for some time in collecting facts to show as precisely as possible the proportion of the wealth of the country held by a few rich men and families; and he finds a greater concentration of wealth here than in any other country. The results of his investigation will appear in the Forum for November, from advance sheets of which the following facts are taken. Mr. Shearman makes the following enumeration of owners of more than $20,000,000 each:

$150,000,000—J. J. Astor, Trinity Church.

$100,000,000—C. Vanderbilt, W. K. Vanderbilt, Jay Gould, Leland Stanford, J. D. Rockefeller.

$70,000,000—Estate of A. Packer.

$60,000,000—John I. Blair, estate of Charles Crocker.

$50,000,000—Wm. Astor, W. W. Astor, Russell Sage, E. A. Stevens, estate of Moses Taylor, estate of Brown & Ives.

$40,000,000—P. D. Armour, F. L. Ames, Wm. Rockefeller, H. M. Flagler, Powers & Weightman, estate of P. Goelet.

$35,000,000—C. P. Huntington, D. O. Mills, estates of T. A. Scott, J. W. Garrett.

$30,000,000—G. B. Roberts, Charles Pratt, Ross Winans, E. B. Coxe, Claus Spreckels, A. Belmont, R. J. Livingston, Fred Weyerhauser, Mrs. Mark Hopkins, Mrs. Hetty Green, estate of S. V. Harkness, R. W. Coleman, I. M. Singer.

$25,000,000—A. J. Drexel, J. S. Morgan, J. P. Morgan, Marshall Field, David Dows, J. G. Fair, E. T. Gerry, estates of Gov. Fairbanks, A. T. Stewart, A. Schermerhorn.

$22,500,000—O. H. Payne, estates of F. A. Drexel, I. V. Williamson, W. F. Weld.

$20,000,000—F. W. Vanderbilt, Theo. Havemeyer, H. O. Havemeyer, W. G. Warden, W. P. Thompson, Mrs. Schenley, J. B. Haggin, H. A. Hutchins, estates of W. Sloane, E. S. Higgins, C. Tower, Wm. Thaw, Dr. Hostetter, Wm. Sharon, Peter Donohue. These 70 names represent an aggregate wealth of $2,700,000,000, an average of more than $37,500,000 each. Mr. Shearman's conclusion is that 25,000 persons own one-half the wealth of the United States; and that the whole wealth of the country is practically owned by 250,000 persons, or one in sixty of the adult male population; and he predicts, from the rapid recent concentration of wealth, that under present conditions 50,000 persons will practically own all the wealth of the country in thirty years—or less than one in 500 of the adult male population.

What Emin Looks Like.

Colonel H. G. Prout, in the November "Scribner," gives the following pen picture of Emin Pasha, whom he knew about thirteen years ago: "In person Emin is a slender man of medium height and tough and wiry figure. He is swarthy, with black eyes and hair. His face is that of a studious professional man, and that impression is heightened by the glasses he always wears. His attitudes and movements are, however, very alert. He stands erect and with his heels together, as if he had been trained a soldier. He was always reticent about himself, and his history was known to no one in the Soudan or the provinces of the Equator. He was supposed to be a Mohammedan. I am not sure that he ever said that he was, but I am quite sure that he did not deny it when I knew him. It has become known later that he is German, of university education; but there were many at that time who thought he was a Turk of extraordinary acquirements. He is certainly a man of great abilities in many ways, and of strong character."

Red Headed Printers.

The London Printer's Register asserts the existence of an ancient aphorism to the effect that red-haired printers are always the fastest. The Troy Press never heard of this natural law before but declares that red-haired compositors are remarkable for their rarity. Our own observation has led to the conclusion that the red-haired ones lead all the others in their modest, shrinking ways and religious fervor.—Buffalo Courier.

W. H. Harvey has been found guilty at Guelph of the brutal murder of his wife and two daughters, and sentenced to be hanged on Nov. 20. This is none too soon either, in our humble estimation.

News is now received that a Kansas City newspaper man has fallen heir to an Edinburgh estate valued at $200,000. This is the first instance on record where a newspaper man didn't earn every cent of his competence, two or three times over. These Americans do tell some tall yarns, anyway.

The denizens of Collingwood are at present in high feather. They will have a ship yard as well as Owen Sound. The Doty Company, of Toronto—a wealthy concern—will shortly begin a ship-building business there, the plant having already been shipped from Scotland, and we believe the agreement states that eight hundred men are to be employed. Hurrah for Collingwood! She hasn't given up the ghost yet, by a long chalk.

Ephestia Kuhniella is the name attached to a new pest which has lately appeared in Canada. It is a flour moth, which infests flouring mills and produce stores, and is capable of doing unlimited damage therein. The provincial Board of Health have issued a circular descriptive of this flour moth, warning millers and dealers to be on their guard against it, and describing the best methods for its destruction. The pamphlet is complied by the secretary, P. H. Bryce, M. A., M.D.

In the years 1799-1800 McKenzie discovered the great north river bearing his name, and crossed the Rocky mountains to the Pacific coast. In 1804 Lewis and Clark traversed the continent via the Missouri and Columbia rivers. For forty years thereafter the "star of empire" stood comparatively stationary above the ninetieth degree of longitude, and in the case of Canada it remained at that point for sixty years and more. Since the passing of the British North American Act, however, in 1867, and the confederation of the provinces, the march of progress has been a most remarkable one. No country on earth can show a greater amount of progress in a corresponding period of time. The area of Canada is nearly as great as the whole of Europe, and considerably greater than that of the United States. It is bound from coast to coast with a great iron highway. Its great possibilities are opening the eyes of our cousins to the south to a sense of insecurity, and causing a general squirm. Canada is, truly, the greatest possession of the British realm, but all these things many of her people do not appear to properly understand. Some people are so dull of comprehension that knowledge must be pounded into their heads. It may be so in this case.

Balsam Valley Items.

From our own Correspondent.

The beautiful foliage that made our woods look so pretty all summer is fast disappearing before the incessant attacks of Jack Frost, and as we hear the wind whistle through the almost naked branches and ruthlessly carry off a few of the remaining rags with an exultant whirr as it proceeds on its southward journey (may it get a warm drink before it comes back) it makes us button two more buttons on our coat and seriously consider the necessity of providing ourselves with flannel underclothing as a protection against Old Winter, which our imagination pictures to us as coming upon a quick trot. But Jack Frost is not the only Jack that works in our neighborhood; no indeed. There is farmer Jack who daily drives down to his farm in the glen with his team of bays, and by a liberal use of the rope line on the nigh horse, who is a little slow, he succeeds in getting quite a strip of ground blackened over with his wide plow. There is still another Jack in this vicinity, who, through great cunning and sly habits has managed to keep his name out of the paper until now. Well, I expect some of our critics will say I am too personal in my remarks if I put his surname in, so for their sakes, and not overlooking a slight regard I have for his own feelings, I will withold it this time, but in so doing I consider I am returning good for evil. For in all my acquaintance with him (and scores of others will say the same thing) I never once knew him to concede or make any sacrifice whatever to oblige any person. Sometimes some of our residents are sitting in a chair reclining against the wall after dinner, enjoying a smoke or reading a very interesting love story, when all at once a loud, piercing, terrific, unearthly roar somes piercing through the air and knocks against the ear drum with such a force that paper or pipe falls suddenly to the floor, and you behold a man or woman, as the case may be, with eyes and mouth wide open exclaiming between gasps, "What was that!" as their eyes wander around in a vain search for the object from which the noise came. When they are informed that it was Jack made the noise, their countenance drops and they feel a little sold, but all they say is "Humph, if I ever," and resume their reading. There was once a boy who asked his father what a fool was. His father replied, "A fool is a man who tickles the hind leg of a mule." I think if Jack's bite is as bad as his bark, that a man who tickles his mouth would be the greatest fool. Now, dear readers, this Jack is none other than James Wilson's mule, and I hope you will not think me too personal.

Mr. A. McDonal has re-rented J. McDonal's farm, and he may be seen as regular as the day, urging on his trusty team, and although he takes a very narrow strip each time, yet he succeeds in getting a remarkable lot of the sod turned down. The rest of our farmers are, of course, doing their share, too, but I consider it would take up too much valuable space to make particular mention of all of them individually, but I hope they will pardon me for my seeming neglect, as I do not wish to be thought partial. Suffice it to say, that on almost every farm there is a little plowing done.

Mr. Sidney Blakeston has gone to the Michigan lumber woods where he intends to put in the winter. We wish you luck, Sid, and hope you may relish beans and pork.

The S. S. social is past, and the only thing we're sorry for is that such events do not happen oftener, as we love to indulge in the consumption of fruit cakes, pies and sandwiches, and various other cakes too numerous to remember the names, also to listen to the excellent programs that are got up for such special occasions. Everybody seemed to enjoy themselves well and there was a very good turnout considering the wet night. Proceeds, $13.00

Mr. D. McIntyre had a ploughing bee one day recently and a spree at night, although there were not many there in the day, there being 3 teams, they turned out in sufficiently large numbers at night to make up for it and tripped the light fantastic until the "wee sma' hours in the morning."

Miss Catherine Ferguson, who was visiting friends here, has returned home. A young man, a relative of her mother's, drove her to Mount Forest with the intention of catching the noon train, but somehow, we presume by being a little too attentive to her and not attentive enough to his whip, he just reached there in time to have the mortification of seeing the great iron horse vanish in the distance as it gave vent to a loud, shrill whistle, accompanied by a puff of steam which waved gently up and down in a manner suggestiue of "Fare you well Brother Watkins." We understand she waited patiently at a friend's house until the arrival of the next train.

Mr. Alf Leak has the contract of plastering A. Ferguson's house.

Mr. W. Stewart has moved into his new house. He is the only retired farmer Balsam Valley can boast of.

Occasionally we see a hunter parading along the outskirts of the woods in quest of deer. We have not heard of any being shot yet, but there is one hound missing. We hope the owners may find him, as it is very unsatisfactory hunting without a hound.

A Mean Trick.

To the Editor of The Advance.

DEAR SIR,—I wish to mention a mean little trick which was played at the Presbyterian church shed on Sunday last, where I had a valuable whip stolen. The person is hereby respectfully requested to quietly return it or he will be prosecuted, as he is well known. It is a pity some persons cannot keep their hands in their own pockets, especially on Sunday. If the person above referred to (and he does not live far away from Flesherton) wishes to keep his name out of public print, he had better return what he stole, when he should have been in better company. Thanking you for your valuable space, I remain, yours truly. W. L. BUSKIN.

To the Editor of The Advance.

DEAR SIR,—We were pleased to see your invitation to us to reply to Anti-Mormon in The Advance. We had previously heard of your conversation in Priceville, and feel sorry that we should have accused you wrongly. We naturally thought that you had received and ignored our reply. We honor the spirit of liberty and justice which you have manifested in giving both sides equal privileges in your columns, and allowing your readers to judge for themselves between truth and error. It is a trait of character that is seldom manifested, and should be respected in those who possess it. The articles from Anti-Mormon will be replied to as soon as possible. Thanking you for you kindness, I am yours truly.

From our own Correspondent.

Hallowe'en was duly celebrated by some of the natives, as on the following morning various little depredations of the previous evening were noticed.

Master and Mrs. Bulmer, of Flesherton, visited our fair village last Wednesday, and took a picture of the school and scholars and some scenes around the falls.

Miss Thurston of Kimberley, Miss Baker and Mr. Williams, of Stayner, were the guests of Mrs. Bowerman last week.

Mrs. Davis, of Guelph, is visiting her parents, the Rev. Mr. Watts.

Mr. David Wright, of Flesherton, is engaged as teacher for the ensuing year. He comes well recommended, and it is hoped that his reign will be a successful and prosperous one in the school and the community.

On last Monday morning Mrs. Abigal Bowerman, aged 76 years, quietly passed away into the rest of the weary. The remains were removed to Dunedin on Tuesday and interred in the family burying ground.

Kimberley.

From our own Correspondent.

The noise of the hammer and saw still resounds through our village in a lively manner, from which it would appear that the inhabitants intend to be warm and comfortable during the months of zero, which appear to be not very distant. Our new hall has lately had an iron quadruped inserted in it, and is now ready for action.

Hallowe'en passed without any very serious pranks being played. To be sure, a few gates became wearied of hanging in one place for a year and left their posts of duty.

We are pleased to extend a hand of welcome to our esteemed friend, Mr. Henry Ellis, who has been living in Uncle Sam's domains during the past year.

Mr. Albert Williams and Miss M. Baker, of Stayner, are the guests of Mr. J. M. Thurston.

A company of Kimberley's sportsmen congregated at Mr. Thompson's store the other evening and laid their plans for an extensive squirrel hunt to take place on Nov. 7th, after which supper will be partaken of at the Traveller's Home.

We have not yet heard whether a change in teachers is to take place or not.

VIGILANCE.

Markdale's Latest News.

From our own Correspondent.

Rev. G. Buggin conducted quarterly services Nov. 3rd in the Methodist church, here. Attendance throughout was good. On Monday the regular business meeting was held by the quarterly board. Finances were only in fair shape, as but little grain has been sold, and money is not moving freely. Dr. McBride was elected to a stewardship, and C. W. Rutledge made recording steward, in place of Mr. G. S. Bowes, who has removed to Toronto.

Dr. A. Carman, one of the "big guns" of the Methodist Church, will lecture here, D.V., on Dec. 20 Subject: "Jesuitism."

Benson Bros. now occupy their new store, and really have a very finely fitted up place to do business in. It is still the "Belfast House."

The Orange lodge here gave an oyster supper Tuesday evening, and had ze grande finale in the way of a dancing party.

Mr. Jarvis Henry was married to Miss Hill, daughter of Wm. Hill, Artemesia, and niece of S. Hill, merchant, here. Ceremony performed by Rev. J. E. Graham at the residence of the bride's father on Tuesday, Nov. 5. If Jarvis ever deserves and gets a blowing up he will remember the day.

A big wedding is on the tapis for Xmas Day in the Methodist church, Markdale.

Many gates and signs had to be hunted up on Nov. 1st. Ye cor. hustled his big one home on his back late Saturday night.

Oats, peas, butter, potatoes and apples appear to be the marketable commodities now.

It is reported that in parliamentary elections we have been disfranchised, by the T. C. not adding the letters M. F. opposite every man's assessment entry. If this is true, and an election is sprung on in the next six months, where will we come in? LUX.

The jury at Orangeville Friday returned a verdict of not guilty in the case of Henry Atkinson, charged with killing James A. Scott.

Characteristics of the Past Week Carefully Culled for the Curious.

Division Court is being held in Flesherton to-day (Thursday.)

Mr. E. Vanzant, Flesherton's marble "king," has his new shop nearly completed.

It is rumored that W. P. Crosley has disposed of his 'bus line to Mr. Dick Pedlar.

W. Trimble, Esq., is in Toronto looking after sales of produce. Mr. R. Keefer is with him.

Deer hunters have had very poor luck around here this fall. We have heard of but two animals being secured.

On Nov. 11th, cattle fair day, Mrs. C. Treadgold will sell her household furniture for cash. Sale will commence at 1 o'clock.

Miss Page, of Welland, and Miss Tottie Tucky, of the same place, are the guests of Mrs. Munshaw and Mrs. Damude.

A mild type of scarlet fever is getting in its work in this village just now. Master Vick Kester, of the Advance staff, has been laid on the shelf with it during the past week.

Mr. W. J. Howard had the second finger of his right hand very nearly amputated by a shaper in the factory on Friday last. The bone was snapped off and the flesh badly lacerated.

A Beetonism: J. R. Croft lost his ring three weeks ago when out chasing the festive partridge to its lair. Last week a son of Thos. Nichols fell in the creek in his father's bush and emerged with Croft's ring on his toe.

Quarterley services will be held in the Methodist church, here, on Sabbath, the morning service to commence at 10.30, instead of 11 o'clock, the usual hour. On Monday the business meeting will be held.

At a meeting of the Flesherton board of trustees, held on Saturday evening last, it was decided to engage Miss Carrie Slack, of Egremont, to take Miss Ganton's position, the latter's certificate expiring at the end of the present year.

On Hallowe'en at Priceville some rowdies threw a stone at the residence of Councillor McArthur. Mrs. McArthur, who was standing in the door, was hit near the knee with the missile and received a severe injury.

Hallowe'en was characterized this fall by a very small amount of depredation. A few boyish asses tried to have a little fun, but one of them was led back to the scene of his humor and made to replace what he had displaced. The others let their fun fizzle out in bowls and through pea guns.

Mr. Henry Ellis, a native of Kimberley, but lately of New Hampshire, returned home last week. He intends returning again to New Hampshire in about a month, where he will take charge of a gentleman's farm. It is rumored that —— —— well, we will let some of our lady readers fill in the hiatus.

Money is scarce, and most loan companies have advanced their rate of interest to 7 per cent on real estate mortgages. S. Damude has a large amount to invest at 6½ per cent., and will be prepared to secure applications. Persons wanting to negotiate new loans or renew, will do well to call before the rate advances higher.

J. G. Russell, Esq., was called away to Hamilton this week to oversee a little transaction of his brother, of that city, and a young lady of the same place. J. G. is a born stage manager, and knows how to call time for a young couple starting in on the drama of life just as well as the best of them. Don't return without a generous piece of the cake, Jehiel Goff.

Catarrh cured, health and sweet breath secured, by Shiloh's catarrh remedy. Price 50 cents. Nasal injector free. For sale at the Medical Hall.

The boys are talking of forming a dramatic club this winter. Good idea. It ought to be encouraged.

The Markdale Standard rises to remark, locally, that "every man's ability may be greatly strengthened and even increased by culture." Quite true. So may the growth of cabbages! Potato bugs, however, gain strength and increase without culture. Don't you think brother, that it would be worth our while to bring these interesting newly-discovered facts before the next meeting of the American Association of Scientists?

Hors de Combat.

Mr. Charley Mosier entered the stall of a horse belonging to Harry Legard, on Friday last. The animal made a lunge at him and bit his cheek severely. It also struck him in the breast with its fore foot and kicked viciously at him when he was getting out of the stall. Charley is now cultivating patches of sticking plaster and has grown a splendid crop of cheek.

Fine Cattle.

Mr. R. Cook, our energetic cattle buyer, shipped a car load of cattle last Thursday. They were delivered here on Wednesday, and The Advance made an inspection of them as they passed through the village. It is seldom, indeed, that so fine a lot of fat animals are seen together. There were twenty-two in the drove, and among them a large number would weigh from fifteen to seventeen hundred pounds. Eight of them went over seventeen hundred. Cattle are pretty well bought up in this neighborhood, but Mr. Cook still appears to be able to find 'em.

Nine cords of Wood in Ten Hours.

By one man may appear to some as an unlikely story; but a machine is now manufactured which has proven such a feat is possible. It can be carried folded on a man's back, saws down trees and runs easy without causing backache. 25,000 now in use and the demand is constantly increasing. Apply to Folding Sawing Machine Co., Chicago, who will send free illustrated catalogue containing testimonials from hundreds who have sawed from 4 to 9 cords in a day. A new invention for filing saws accompanies each machine; same can be had separate. With this tool any one can file a saw better than an expert can without it.

To Our Subscribers.

The special announcement which appeared in our columns some time since, announcing a special arrangement with Dr. B. J. Kendall Co., of Enosburgh Falls, Vt., publishers of "A Treatise on the Horse and his Diseases," whereby our subscribers were enabled to obtain a copy of that valuable work free by sending their address (and enclosing a two-cent stamp for mailing same) is renewed for a limited period. We trust all will avail themselves of this opportunity of obtaining this valuable work. To every lover of the Horse it is indispensable, as it treats in a simple manner all the diseases which afflict this noble animal. Its phenominal sale throughout the United States and Canada, make it standard authority. Mention this paper when sending for "Treatise".

The Thornbury Standard bristles up with assumed indignation because we checked its wild statement that Thornbury markets were superior to those of any of the surrounding towns. The paper now asserts that The Advance gives false market quotations; that Flesherton has only one gristmill, and that an "antediluvian" old thing "fit for nothing but chopping pig feed, and places like Markdale with even worse facilities, cannot possibly have decent markets!" These facetious remarks of Mr. Farewell are very amusing, indeed, and we can scarcely write for laughter at his humor. Just as though the prosperity of a market depended upon its possession of a gristmill! The humor, too, is better understood when it is remembered that Flesherton has at present one first class roller mill and another under course of construction, Mr. Loucks being at present busily engaged converting the "Little Mill" into a roller mill. We might be tempted to give Mr. Farewell a lecture if we thought him in earnest, but his assertion that "the Union Standard was never known to vary from the truth in a single instance since its establishment sixteen years ago," proves conclusively that he was only joking. The Standard wouldn't lie—except for "a consideration."

Artemesia Council.

The above council met in the Town Hall, Flesherton, on Monday last, Nov. 4. All the members present, the reeve in the chair. A communication was received from I. B. Lucas demanding $15 damages to Wm. Brewster's buggy, caused by a defective bridge at the Morey House. The following accounts were received and ordered to be paid: John McArthur, letting and inspecting special grant on town line A. & P., $2; reeve, clerk and assessor for selecting jurors, etc., $13; repairs to bridge on gravel road near Mory House, $5.70. Certificates of receipt of voters' list for 1889 and list of jurors for 1890 were received from the Clerk of the Peace for the county.

Moved by Messrs. J. McArthur and W. Sharp, that the communication of I. B. Lucas, barrister, re damage to Brewster's buggy at Morey bridge be laid on the table, and that the reeve be and is hereby instructed to ascertain the full particulars in the matter and report at the next meeting of Council. Carried.

Moved by Messrs. McArthur and Boland, that Michael Henry be remitted the sum of ten dollars off his taxes on account of his building being destroyed by fire on Oct. 4 last. Carried.

Moved by Messrs. McArthur and Boland, that the application of M. Akitt re reduction of takes on his mill property be not entertained. Carried.

Moved by Messrs. Sharp and Cairns, that an order be issued in favor of Thos. Snell for $3, being for statute labor returned but performed after list was returned, and that the same be handed to Collector Wright and credited to Snell. Carried.

The Council then adjourned to meet again on Monday, Dec. 16, according to statue provided, to receive detailed financial statement of treasurer.

SHE.

Gentle shepherd, tell me, pray,
Has my Colin come this way?
He chants a rustic ritornello
And bears a crook—on his umbrella.
Say, then, gentle shepherd, say,
Has my Colin passed this way?

White his shirt fronts are now milk;
Soft his whiskers are as silk;
He drives no flock, the darling man,
But wears a vest of astrakhan.
Say, then gentle shepherd, say,
Has my Colin passed this way?

POLICEMAN.

If the party as you mean,
Which his name is Peter Green,
Is a clerk with Cash & Co.,
Then I see him thither go.
But don't henceforth address me thus,
I ain't no shepherd on a 'bus.

His pipe—I do not mean a floot—
Appeared to be of briar root;
Where yonder boy's a-blacking shoes,
He stopped and bought a daily news
Then mounted (I'm no shepherd, I)
Upon the knife board of the 'bus.

Love Makes a Change.

"I am sick of the world," he said;
"I am sick of the world and of life;
Of the double-faced hypocrisy
An the strain of the godless strife.

"I am sick of the fools that succeed
I am sick of the sages that fail;
Of the pitiless laughter of wealth,
And of poverty's pitiful wail.

"I am sick of the devils that leer
At innocence passing by;
I will bar my door to the world;
I will lay me down and die."

But there came a change as he spoke,
And the mists were burned away,
And the midnight darkness of despair
Was turned to jocund day.

And the sun burst forth once more,
Till his glories filled the skies,
And the magical power that wrought the change
Was one look in a woman's eyes.

AN AMERICAN GIRL.

"I shall not say 'Octavia' to grandmamma."

Then suddenly she glanced up at him.

"That is sly, isn't it?" she said. "Sometimes I think I am very sly, though I am sure it is not my nature to be so. I would rather be open and candid."

"It would be better," he remarked.

"You think so?" she asked, eagerly.

He could not help smiling.

"Do you ever tell untruths to Lady Theobald?" he inquired. "If you do, I shall begin to be alarmed."

"I act them," she said, blushing more deeply. "I really do—paltry sorts of untruths, you know; pretending to agree with her when I don't, pretending to like things a little when I hate them. I have been trying to improve myself lately, and once or twice it has made her very angry. She says I am disobedient and disrespectful. She asked me, one day, if it was my intentions to emulate Miss Octavia Bassett. That was when I said I could not help feeling that I had wasted time in practicing."

She sighed softly as she ended.

In the meantime, Octavia had Mr. Poppleton and Mr. Francis Barold upon her hands, and was endeavoring to do her duty as hostess by both of them. If it had been her intention to captivate these gentlemen, she could not have complained that Mr. Poppleton was wary or difficult game. His first fears allayed, his downward path was smooth, and rapid in proportion. When he had taken his departure with the little silk purse in his keeping, he had carried under his clerical vest a warmed and thrilled heart. It was a heart which, it must be confessed, was of the most inexperienced and susceptible nature. A little man of affectionate and gentle disposition, he had been given from his earliest youth to indulging in timid dreams of mild future bliss—of bliss represented by some lovely being whose ideals were similar to his own, and who preferred the wealth of a true affection to the glitter of the giddy throng. Upon one or two occasions he had even worshipped from afar; but as on each of these occasions his hopes had been nipped in the bud by the union of their object with some hollow worlding, his dreams had, so far, never attained very serious proportions. Since he had taken up his abode in Slowbridge, he had felt himself a little overpowered by circumstances. It had been a source of painful embarrassment to him to find his innocent presence capable of producing confusion in the breasts of young ladies who were certainly not more guileless than himself. He had been conscious that the Misses Egerton did not continue their conversation with freedom when he chanced to approach the group they graced, and he had observed the same thing in their companions—an additional circumspection of demeanor, so to speak, a touch of new decorum, whose object seemed to be to protect them from any appearance of imprudence.

"It is almost as if they were afraid of me," he had said to himself once or twice. "Dear me! I hope there is nothing in my appearance to lead them to——"

He was so much alarmed by this dreadful thought, that he had ever afterward approached any of these young ladies with a fear and trembling which had not added either to his comfort or their own; consequently, his path had not been a very smooth one.

"I respect the young ladies of Slowbridge," he remarked to Octavia, that very afternoon. "There are some remarkable young ladies here—very remarkable, indeed. They are interested in the church, and the poor, and the schools, and indeed in everything—which is most unselfish and amiable. Young ladies have usually so much to distract their attentions from such matters."

"If I stay long enough in Slowbridge," said Octavia, "I shall be interested in the church, and the poor, and the schools.

It seemed to the curate that there had never been anything so delightful in the world as her laugh and her unusual remarks. She seemed to him so beautiful, and so exhilarating, that he forgot all else but his admiration for her. He enjoyed himself so much, this afternoon, that he was almost brilliant, and excited the sarcastic comment of Mr. Francis Barold, who was not enjoying himself at all.

"Confound it!" said that gentleman to himself, as he looked on. "What did I come here for? This style of thing is just what I might have expected. She is amusing herself with that poor little cad now, and I am left in the cold. I suppose that is her habit with the young men in Nevada."

He had no intention of entering the lists with the Rev. Arthur Poppleton, or of concealing the fact that he felt that this little Nevada flirt was making a blunder. The sooner she knew it the better for herself; so he played his game as badly as possible, and with much dignity.

But Octavia was so deeply interested in Mr. Poppleton's ardent effort to do credit to her teaching, that she was apparent unconscious of all else. She played with great cleverness, and carried her partner to the terminus, with an eager enjoyment of her skill quite pleasant to behold. She made little darts here and there, advised, directed, and controlled his movements, and was quite dramatic in a small way when he made a failure.

Mrs. Burnham, who was superintending the proceeding, seated in her own easy-chair behind her window-curtains, was roused to virtuous indignation by her energy.

"There is no repose whatever in her manner," she said. "No dignity. Is a game of croquet a matter of deep moment? It seems to me that it is almost impious to devote one's mind so wholly to a mere means of recreation."

"She seems to be enjoying it, mamma," said Miss Laura Burnham, with a faint sigh. Miss Laura had been looking on over her parent's shoulder. "They all seem to be enjoying it. See how Lucia Gaston and Mr. Burmistone are laughing. I never saw Lucia look like that before. The only one who seems a little dull is Mr. Barold."

"He is probably disgusted by a freedom of manner to which he is not accustomed," replied Mrs. Burnham. "The only wonder is that he has not been disgusted by it before."

CHAPTER XVII.

ADVANTAGES.

The game was over, Octavia deserted her partner. She walked lightly, and with the air of a victor, to where Barold was standing. She was smiling and slightly flushed, and for a moment or so stood fanning herself with a gay Japanese fan.

"Don't you think I am a good teacher?" she asked, at length.

"I should say so," replied Barold, without enthusiasm. "I am afraid I am not a judge."

She waved her fan airily.

"I have a good pupil," she said. Then she held her fan still for a moment, and turned fully towards him. "I have done something you don't like," she said. "I knew I had."

Mr. Francis Barold retired within himself at once. In his present mood it really appeared that she was assuming that he was very much interested indeed.

"I should scarcely take the liberty upon a limited acquaintance," he began.

She looked at him steadily, fanning herself with slow, regular movements.

"Yes," she remarked. "You're mad. I knew you were."

He was so evidently disgusted by this observation that she caught at the meaning of his look, and laughed a little.

"Ah!" she said," that's an American word, ain't it? It sounds queer to you. You say 'vexed' instead of 'mad.' Well, then, you are vexed."

"If I have been so clumsy as to appear ill-humored," he said," I beg pardon. Certainly I have no right to exhibit such unusual interest in your conduct."

He felt that this was rather decidedly to the point, but she did not seem overpowered at all. She smiled anew.

"Anybody has a right to be mad—I mean vexed," she observed, "I should like to know how people would live if they hadn't. I am mad—I mean vexed—twenty times a day."

"Indeed?" was his sole reply.

"Well," she said, "I think it's real mean in you to be so cool about it when you remember what I told you the other day."

"I regret to say I don't remember, just now. I hope it was nothing very serious."

To his astonishment she looked down at her fan and spoke in a slightly lowered voice.

"I told you that I wanted to be improved."

It must be confessed that he was mollified. There was a softness in her manner which amazed him. He was at once embarrassed and delighted. But, at the same time, it would not do to commit himself to too great a seriousness.

"Oh!" he answered, "that was a rather good joke, I thought."

"No, it wasn't," she said, perhaps even half a tone lower. "I was in earnest."

Then she raised her eyes,

"If you told me when I did anything wrong, I think it might be a good thing," she said.

He felt that this was quite possible, and was also struck with the idea that he might find the task of mentor—so long as he remained entirely non-committed—rather interesting. Still he could not afford to descend at once from the elevated stand he had taken.

"I am afraid you will find it rather tiresome," he remarked.

"I am afraid you would," she answered. "You would have to tell me of things so often."

"Do you mean seriously to tell me that you would take my advice?" he inquired.

"I mightn't take all of it," was her reply, "but I should take some—perhaps a good deal."

"Thanks," he remarked. "I scarcely think I should give you a good deal.

She simply smiled.

"I have never had any advice at all," she said. "I don't know that I should have taken it, if I had—just as likely as not I shouldn't; but I never had any. Father spoiled me. He gave me all my own way. He said he didn't care, as long as I had a good time, and I must say I have generally had a good time. I don't see how I could help it—with all my own way, and no one to worry. I wasn't sick, and I could buy anything I liked, and all that—so I had a good time. I've read of girls, in books, wishing they had mothers to take care of them. I don't know that I ever wished for one particularly. I can take care of myself. I must say, too, that I don't think some mothers are much of an institution. I know girls who have them, and they are always worrying."

He laughed in spite of himself, and though she had been speaking with the utmost seriousness and naivete she joined him.

When they ceased, she returned suddenly to the charge.

"Now tell me what I have done, this afternoon, that isn't right," she said—"that Lucia Gaston wouldn't have done, for instance. I say that because I shouldn't mind being a little like Lucia Gaston—in some things."

"Lucia ought to feel gratified," he commented.

"She does," she answered. "We had a little talk about it, and she was as pleased as could be. I didn't think of it in that way until I saw her begin to blush. Guess what she said,"

"I am afraid I can't."

"She said she saw so many things to envy in me, that she could scarcely believe I wanted to be at all like her."

"It was a very civil speech," said Barold, ironically. "I scarcely thought Lady Theobald had trained her so well."

"She meant it," said Octavia. You mayn't believe it, but she did. I know when people mean things and when they don't."

"I wish I did," said Barold.

Octavia turned her attention to her fan.

"Well I am waiting," she said.

"Waiting?" he repeated.

"To be told of my faults."

"But I scarcely see of what importance my opinion can be."

"It is of some importance to me—just now."

The last two words rendered him really impatient, and it may be spurred him up.

"If we are to take Lucia Gaston as a model," he said, "Lucia Gaston would possibly not have been so complaisant in her demeanor toward our clerical friend."

"Complaisant!" she exclaimed, opening her lovely eyes. "When I was actually plunging about the garden trying to teach him to play. Well, I shouldn't call that being complaisant."

"Lucia Gaston," he replied, "would not say that she had been 'plunging' about the garden."

She gave herself a moment for reflection.

"That's true," she remarked, when it was over; "she wouldn't. When I compare myself with the Slowbridge girls, I begin to think I must say some pretty awful things."

Barold made no reply, which caused her to laugh a little again.

"You daren't tell me," she said. "Now do I? Well, I don't think I want to know very particularly. What Lady Theobald thinks will last quite a good while. Complaisant!"

"I am sorry you object to the word," he said.

"Oh, I don't!" she answered. "I like it. It sounds so much more polite than to say I was flirting and being fast."

"Were you flirting?" he inquired, coldly.

He objected to her ready serenity very much.

She looked a little puzzled.

"You are very like Aunt Belinda," she said.

He drew himself up. He did not think there was any resemblance at all between Miss Belinda and himself.

She went on, without observing his movement.

"You think everything means something, or is of some importance. You said that just as Aunt Belinda says 'What will they think?' It never occurs to me that they'll think at all. Gracious! Why should they?"

"You will find they do," he said.

"Well," she said, glancing at the group gathered under the laburnum tree, "just now Aunt Belinda thinks we had better go over to her, so suppose we do it. At any rate, I found out that I was too complaisant to Mr. Poppleton."

When the party separated for the afternoon, Barold took Lucia home, and Mr. Burmistone and the curate walked down the street together.

Mr. Poppleton was indeed most agreeably exhilarated. His expressive little countenance beamed with delight.

"What a charming person Miss Bassett is!" he exclaimed, after they had left the gate. "What a very charming person indeed!"

"Very charming," said Mr. Burmistone, with much seriousness. "A prettier young person I certainly have never seen; and those wonderful gowns of hers——"

"Oh!" interrupted Mr. Poppleton, with natural confusion. "I—I referred to Miss Belinda Bassett; though, really, what you say is very true. Miss Octavia Bassett—indeed—I think—in fact, Miss Octavia Bassett is quite—one might almost say even more charming than her aunt."

"Yes," admitted Mr. Burmistone; "perhaps one might. She is less ripe, it is true; but that is an objection time will remove."

"There is such a delightful gayety in her manner," said Mr. Poppleton; "such an ingenuous frankness; such—a—a such spirit! It—quite carries me away with it—quite."

He walked a few steps, thinking over this delightful gayety and ingenuous frankness, and then burst out afresh.

"And what a remarkable life she has had too! She actually told me that, once in her childhood, she lived for months in a gold-diggers' camp—the only woman there. She says the men were kind to her, and made a pet of her. She has known the most extraordinary people."

In the meantime, Francis Barold returned Lucia to Lady Theobald's safe-keeping. Having done so, he made his adieus, and left the two to themselves. Her ladyship was, it must be confessed, a little at a loss to explain to herself what she saw, or fancied she saw, in the manner and appearance of her young relative. She was persuaded that she had never seen Lucia look as she looked this afternoon. She had a brighter color in her cheeks than usual, her pretty figure seemed more erect, her eyes had a spirit in them which was quite new. She had chatted and laughed gaily with Francis Barold as she approached the house, and after his departure she moved to and fro with a freedom not habitual to her.

"He has been making himself agreeable to her," said my lady, with grim pleasure. "He can do it if he chooses; and he is just the man to please a girl—good-looking, and with a fine, domineering air."

"How did you enjoy yourself?" she asked.

"Very much," said Lucia. "Never more, thank you."

"Oh!" ejaculated my lady. "And which of her smart New York gowns did Miss Octavia Bassett wear?"

They were at the dinner table, and instead of looking down at her soup, Lucia looked quietly and steadily across the table at her grandmother.

"She wore a very pretty one," she said. "It was pale fawn-color, and fitted her like a glove. She made me feel very old-fashioned, and badly dressed."

Lady Theobald laid down her spoon.

"She made you feel old-fashioned and badly dressed you'"—

"Yes," responded Lucia. "She always does. I wonder what she thinks of the things we wear in Slowbridge." And she even went to the length of smiling a little.

"What she thinks of what is worn in Slowbridge!" Lady Theobald ejaculated. "She! May I ask what weight the opinion of a young woman from America—from Nevada—is supposed to have in Slowbridge?"

Lucia took a spoonful of soup in a leisurely manner.

"I don't think it is supposed to have any," she said; "but—but I don't think she minds that. I feel as if I shouldn't if I were in her place. I have always thought her very luckly."

"You have thought her lucky!" cried my lady. "You have envied a Nevada young woman, who dresses like an actress, and loads herself with jewels like a barbarian? A girl whose conduct toward men is of a character to—to chill one's blood!"

"They admire her," said Lucia, simply. "More than they admire Lydia Egerton, and more than they admire me."

"Do you admire her?" demanded my lady.

"Yes, grandmamma," replied Lucia, courageously. "I think I do."

Never had my lady been so astounded in her life. For a moment she could scarcely speak. When she recovered herself she pointed to the door.

"Go to your room," she commanded. "This is American freedom of speech, I suppose. Go to your room."

Lucia rose obediently. She could no help wondering what her ladyship's course would be if she had the hardihood to disregard her order. She really looked quite capable of carrying it out forcibly herself. When the girl stood at her bedroom window a few minutes later, her cheeks were burning and her hands trembling.

"I am afraid it is very badly done," she said to herself. "I am sure it was: but—but it will be a kind of practice. I was in such a hurry to try if I was equal to it, that I didn't seem to balance things quite rightly. I ought to have waited until I had more reason to speak out. Perhaps there wasn't enough reason then, and I was more aggressive than I ought to have been. Octavia is never aggressive. I wonder if I was at all pert. I felt a little as if I meant to be pert. I don't think Octavia ever means to be pert. I must learn to balance myself, and only be cool and frank."

Then she looked out of the window, and reflected a little.

"I was not so very brave, after all," she said, rather reluctantly. "I didn't tell her Mr. Burmistone was there. I daren't have done that. I am afraid I am sly—that sounds sly, I am sure.'

CHAPTER XVIII.

CONTRAST.

"Lady Theobald will put a stop to it," was the general remark. "It will certainly not occur again."

This was said upon the evening of the first gathering upon Miss Belinda's grass-plot, and at the same time it was prophesied that Mr. Francis Barold would soon go away.

But neither of the prophecies proved true. Mr. Francis Barold did not return to London, and, strange to say, Lucia was seen again and again playing croquet with Octavia Bassett, and was even known to spend evenings with her.

Perhaps it might be that an appeal made by Miss Belinda to her ladyship had caused her to allow these things. Miss Belinda had, in fact, made a private call upon my lady, to lay her case before her.

"I feel so very timid about everything," she said, almost with tears, "and so fearful of trusting myself, that I really find it quite a trial. The dear child has such a kind heart—I assure you she has a kind heart, dear Lady Theobald—and is so innocent of any intention to do wrong—I am sure she is innocent—that it seems cruel to judge her severely. If she had had the benefit of such training as dear Lucia's, I am convinced that her conduct would have been most exemplary. She sees herself that she has faults—I am sure she does. She said to me, only last night, in that odd way of hers—she had been sitting evidently thinking deeply, for some minutes—and she said: 'I wonder if I shouldn't be nicer if I was more like Lucia Gaston.' You see what turn her mind must have taken. She admires Lucia so much."

"Yesterday evening, at dinner," said Lady Theobald, severely, "Lucia informed me that she admired your niece. The feeling seems to be mutal."

Miss Belinda colored, and brightened visibly.

"Did she, indeed,?" she exclaimed. "How pleased Octavia will be to hear it. Did she, indeed?" Then, warned by a chilliness and lack of response in her ladyship's manner, she modified her delight, and became apologetic again. "These young people are more—are less critical than we are," she sighed. "Octavia's great prettiness——"

"I think," Lady Theobald interposed, "that Lucia has been taught to feel that the body is corruptible, and subject to decay, and that mere beauty is of small moment."

Miss Belinda sighed again.

"That is very true," she admitted, deprecatingly; "very true, indeed."

"It is to be hoped that Octavia's stay in Slowbridge will prove beneficial to her," said her ladyship, in her most judicial manner. "The atmosphere is wholly unlike that which has surrounded her during her previous life."

"I am sure it will prove beneficial to her," said Miss Belinda eagerly. "The companionship of well-trained and refined young people cannot fail to be of use to her. Such a companion as Lucia would be, if you would kindly permit her to spend an evening with us now and then would certainly improve and modify her greatly. Mr. Francis Barold is—is, I think, of the same opinion—at least, I fancied I gathered as much from a few words he let fall."

"Francis Barold?" repeated Lady Theobald. "And what did Francis Barold say?"

(To be Continued).

Mr. Slowpay's Jest.

They had had toast every morning for six weeks.

"Madam," said Mr. Slowpay, "I am not afraid of pie; I can bravely face home-made biscuit; I have never been known to fly from sponge cake, but," and here he wiped the perspiration from his brow, "but, madam, I quail on toast."

MARRYING FOR MONEY.

Those who think a divorce can be obtained in Chicago for any kind of a reason, or for no reason at all, are quite mistaken. Only the other day a woman was refused a divorce by a Chicago judge. It seems that one Louis Burnstein, who has a position in a wholesale store, where he earns enough to provide himself with clothes and cigarettes, had been paying court to Lena Friedman, who, of course, was pretty, and wealthy to the extent of possessing $25 in her own right. Young Burnstein, a minor, and with the gorgeous imagination of youth, never tired of telling Lena how much money he had, what an elegant home she would have, what servants and carriages at her command, if she would but marry him. This catalogue of attractions would have turned older feminine heads than Lena's, and she hesitated only so much as to make sure of her captive. A license obtained, the two were united by a justice. Then Louis borrowed Lena's cash. That was on the 25th of May, and from that day Lena saw no more of her lord. She told her pa, who said he would "look into it," and when he found who his son-in-law really was he advised and the girl consented to seek a divorce. But Judge Shepard helped the young man, the defendant, out by keeping him in. He followed the ancient ruling that "all is fair in love," and that "the law does not prescribe deceit as to a man's means as a cause for divorce." It seems from this that if "the woman in the case" is marrying for money she had better make sure that the money is there before the minister comes in.

Afraid to Lie Down.

Who knows why birds sleep standing on one leg? The position seems most unnatural. Reasoning in advance, we should pronounce it a tiresome, if not an impossible attitude. Yet the canary tucks its head under its wing, draws up one foot, and goes to sleep, apparently with quite as much comfort as we experience on the best of mattresses. A writer in Horse and Stable notes a similar, though less abnormal, habit on the part of horses, who, it appears, are in many cases very averse to lying down. The writer once rode a mare seventy miles in a single day. The stable in which she was put for the night was as comfortable as it could well be made, but she stood up all night long. She ate her oats and hay and then went to sleep, leaning forward with her breast against the manger. There are horses that have never been seen to lie down, nor have any marks of their having done so ever been found upon their bodies. I recall one that for fifteen years occupied a particular stall in my grandfather's stable. Up to the hour he died no one ever saw him lying down, although special watch was sometimes kept after he had been driven for eight or ten hours. Unless a horse lies down regularly his rest cannot be complete, and his joints and sinews stiffen. It is true that some horses that always sleep in a standing position continue to work for many years, but it is equally true that they would live longer and work better if they rested naturally. Young horses from the country are liable to refuse to lie down when first put into a stable in town, and the injurious habit may become confirmed unless special pains are taken to induce a change. The indisposition to lie down is often very pronounced in sick horses. They seem to have an instinctive fear that if they lie down they may never be able to rise, and continue on their feet till their limbs refuse to bear them up.

Victoria's Crown.

Queen Victoria's crown, kept with other royal regalia under strong guard at the old tower, and worn only on state occasions, is one of the most costly insignias now in existence. To begin with, there are twenty diamonds around the circlet or head-band, each worth $7,500 or $150,000 for the set. Besides these twenty there are two extra large centre diamonds, each valued at $10,000, making $20,000 more; fifty-four smaller diamonds, placed at the angles of the others, each valued at $500; four crosses, each worth $60,000, and composed of twenty-five diamonds; four large diamonds on top of crosses, each having a money value of $5,000; twelve diamonds in the fleur-de-lis, $50,000; eighteen smaller diamonds contained in the same, $10,000; pearls, diamonds, and rubies, upon arches and circlets not metioned before, $50,000; also 141 small diamonds formed in roses and monograms $25,000; twenty-six diamonds in upper cross, $15,500; two circles of pearls about the rim of the head-piece, $15,000 each. The total money value of this relic in any jeweler's market in the world would be at least $600,000, metal and all included.—St. Louis Republic.

GOOD ADVICE.

If you worry when there's trouble,
You but make the trouble double—
Do not fret.
Bear up bravely, don't cry, baby,

WINNIPEG NEWS NOTES.

A number of friends of Mr. C. A. Sadlier, late Clerk of the Manitoba Legislature, waited upon him last evening and presented him with an address and a well-filled purse prior to his departure for Toronto, where he will enter Wycliffe College and study for the ministry.

The Canadian Pacific officials positively refuse to make connections with the Northern Pacific until compelled to, and a local squabble of considerable interest is at present going on. Mr. Jas. Ross, contractor of the new Regina & Long Lake Railway in the territories, purchased a very large quantity of ties along the line of the N. P. R. south. In all he expects to bring in about 250 cars to be used on his railway. These cars are arriving in the city daily, a number coming in to-day, but so far the C. P. R. has refused to allow a transfer to be made to their line, so that the material can be sent to Regina. It is said that the C. P. R. management has been approached at different times, but they always take a stubborn attitude and say these N. P. cars shall not be transferred on their line until they are compelled to receive them by order of the Dominion Government. The N.P.R. has offered to put the tracks together temporarily, taking up the connection as soon as the ties are over, but the C. P. R. will not consent to this. The ties will likely have to be transferred to C. P. R. cars by means of teams, which will cost the contractors considerably more.

Egan Bros. have finished their grading contract on the C. P. R. Souris branch, and will ship their outfit into the city this week. On Monday they start work on the Winnipeg & Southeastern Railway.

The steamer Colville arrived at Selkirk from Moose Creek at noon to-day, having on board the body of an Englishman named Harry Ewing, who was accidentally shot in Wm. Robinson's lumber camp. While one of the workmen named Dan Cameron was handling a gun it was accidentally discharged, and the contents lodged in the head of Ewing, killing him instantly. Cameron gave himself up.

Matcheesis and Stoney Paul, two Indians confined in the barracks at Fort Saskatchewan, escaped on Tuesday evening. They walked out past the guard, who was short-sighted. A policeman outside noticed them and raised the alarm. Stoney Paul was captured before he reached cover, but the other got in the bushes and escaped.

Superintendent Whyte, of the Canadian Pacific Railway, denies his company has been seeking to obstruct the Northern Pacific in handling ties for the Regina & Long Lake road. He says every reasonable facility has been extended.

A verdict of not guilty has been rendered in the Heffer manslaughter case.

A company is being formed here to establish a cemetery on the banks of the Red River. Fort Rouge city contemplated going into a similar enterprise, but will probably withdraw in favor of the company.

ROBBED A JUDGE.

Midnight Mechanics Make a Haul at St. Joseph, Mo.

A St. Joseph, Mo., despatch of Thursday says: At 2.30 this morning three masked robbers entered the residence of Judge Henry Kelly, and going to the room where the judge and his wife were sleeping, one of the robbers covered them with his revolver, while the others searched the room for valuables, obtaining $600 in jewels, gold watches and money. The robbers then searched the bed for valuables and lastly took the rings from Mrs. Kelly's fingers. On the judge stating that he had no money concealed about the house, he was struck over the head with a revolver and threatened with death if he did not tell where the money was. The robbers escaped.

The Minister's Wife.

There is, strictly speaking, no propriety in expecting the woman who has espoused a clergyman to have an ex-officio special fitness for departments of charitable and religious labor. Common sense rules that she may suit him excellently well as a wife, yet be endowed with no particular gifts for "leading meetings" and "taking chairs." Yet by an anomalous incongruity, inseparable from the situation, the next worse thing to absolute insignificance in her case is decided significance. To outshine or to outwork her lord is to demonstrate his insufficiency to fill the high and responsible office to which he was elected. If she be a cipher she detracts from his worth. He cannot, after the manner of other public men, bold in the knowledge that their houses are their castles, cast himself between her and her censors with the protest, "A poor thing, but mine own!" I have known men thus "hindered" to drag the shivering weaklings into the fore front of the battle, prick them into action beyond their strength by frantic appeals to expediency, custom, pride, love, piety, until the victims of a false system, wounded and wearied to their death, fell under the harness so much too heavy for them. The gaps they leave are quickly filled, often by stronger stuff. If I dared relate the humble tragedies of this kind which have come under my eye, the rush of recruits into the places of the fallen martyrs might be less eager.—North American Review.

Explosion on a Cunarder.

A Holyhead cable of Thursday says: The Cunard liner Cephalonia was seen rounding the Skerries and making for this port at 4 o'clock this afternoon. Upon her arrival it was ascertained that she left Liverpool this morning at 11 o'clock, bound for Boston, and that as she was nearing the Skerries an explosion occurred in the stokehole. Second engineer John M. Farlane and four firemen, John Price, John Malcolm, John Webb and John C. Price, were severely scalded by steam. They were treated by the ship's doctor and afterwards landed at Holyhead and admitted to Stanley Hospital. It is not known how the explosion was caused, as the machinery was examined before leaving Liverpool. The vessel will return there.

Marion Harland, in speaking of the various phases of woman's philanthropic activity, beautifully says: "Under whatever name we may be working, our end is the same. It needs only that good women and true look into each other's faces and talk together to make sure of this. "The way is narrow; can we then, far separate, reach our heavenly home'"

FASHIONS, FACTS AND FANCIES.

A Cup of Tea.

It seems a simple thing enough; yet of the millions who use this refreshing and agreeable beverage a very small proportion understand how to prepare it, says the London Telegram. But if not properly made, tea is deprived of a great deal of its value, and sometimes rendered absolutely injurious. The water to be used should boil, and it should be poured on the tea immediately it boils; if allowed to overboil, the peculiar property of boiling water which acts upon tea evaporates and eventually disappears. Tea should not be a decoction, but an infusion. If allowed to stew it becomes little better than a decoction of tannic acid. Tea that is overdrawn is hurtful to the nerves, and to the digestion. As to the precise number of minutes which should be devoted to the process of drawing, some people will say five minutes, some seven and some will perhaps go as far as ten, but our experience is in favor of six; this suffices to bring out the flavor, quality and strength. Just as much tea as is wanted should be made—no more. Make fresh tea as often as it is required. The replenishing of the teapot with fresh hot water is very objectionable. As the thorough heating of the receptacle is of the first importance, the teapot should be made thoroughly hot before the tea is put in it. The earthenware teapot is preferred to all others by many connoisseurs, and it is superfluous to say that whatever utensil is used for this purpose should be immaculately clean. Tea is an extremely delicate article. Its susceptibility to the odors of commodities near it is a source of danger and deterioration, as it readily takes up the smell of coffee, cocoa, spices, cheese, bacon or other articles of pronounced odor. The complaints sometimes made about tea would probably not arise if always kept in places free from such contagion. Tea should be stored in a warm dry place; unnecessary exposure to the air should be avoided. Even when securely packed in the leaded chests in which it arrives in England, the change from the glowing heat of eastern skies to the damp and humid atmosphere of this climate deprives tea of much of its beautiful fragrance. Tea of much better quality than is generally dispensed at our railway stations and refreshment rooms can be bought at 2s. per pound. A pound of tea would make 128 cups. This is considerably less than a farthing per cup. You may well ask why is it that we should be still charged 4d. and 6d. "for a little hot milk and water slightly flavored with undesirable tannin."

The Care of the Hair.

The fashionable girl of New York has modelled herself so closely upon her English contemporaries in dress, manner and ideas that to the casual observer there seems to be no way of distinguishing them, not even by voice, for no New York girl rests content until she has acquired the exact tone and inflections of Hon. Miss Charteriss and Lady Gwendolens, who rule in such matters on the other side, says the New York World. The London tailor and coatmaker makes them indistinguishable as to dress; tennis, Russian baths and horseback exercise give them the same erect carriage and glowing complexion, and careful imitation results in the same absolutely correct and colorless manner. There is but one point in which they fail of such exact reproduction that they can't be told apart by experts, and that is the silken sleekness of their hair. Our climate, with its extremes, is very hard upon the hair and tends, despite careful care and brushing, to make it harsh and rough and to break it and render it uneven. The smooth, shiny chestnut locks of the average English girl are one of her greatest charms and this is the way she preserves their beauty: She takes half a pint of pure glycerine which she puts in a quart bottle, and to this she adds six ounces of lime water, shaking the two together vigorously. When these are properly churned the lime water turns the glycerine into a white, soft cream. Upon going to bed the female Britisher takes a little of this and rubs it with her finger-tips into the roots of her hair, giving it a vigorous brushing that distributes the cream from roots to tip. This she does once a week, with the result of keeping her hair silken soft and not only preserving its bright chestnut color, but of keeping the scalp perfectly clean and white. Mrs. Kendal, who wears her hair in smooth bandeaux over her ears, has always used this since her girlhood, with the result that her locks look as fresh and bright as when she was 16, and all women know that hair ages as much as the face, not only by turning gray but by getting hard and losing its gloss and bright tints. This, with a little cold cream to rub stage paint out of her cheeks with, is the only toilet paint Mrs. Kendal ever uses.

BEAUTY AND HEALTH.

The day has come when the American woman desires, first of all, to be beautiful, and then to be healthful, but to accomplish the first she must first achieve the second. The days when a delicate, frail figure and pale face were the outward and visible sign of a delicately bred lady have sunk into the past, almost forgotten, and in their stead an epoch has opened in which fresh, bright complexions and sparkling eyes are the one desired object in our young women's personal appearance. Whatever pertains to good health her whole soul binds to. She studies hygiene. The laws of health are not to be disobeyed in any way, not even are late hours to be kept, unless a midday nap is taken. No wine, nor tea, nor coffee; only good, wholesome milk from the cow is to be imbibed by the devotee at beauty's shrine. Fruit, grains and simply cooked meats, with graham or coarse bread, with very little liquid at meal times is the very best diet possible for hurrying about the desired results of good health and consequent good looks. The bath, which is one of the most, if not the most important factor of health, is a question not easily dealt with. There are some persons who cannot take a cold sponge bath on account of the shock to the nervous system, yet who can take it with great ease after standing a few moments in hot water. This method is endorsed by the medical faculty for the quickening of the circulation.

Give the Girls a Chance.

"Oh, how glad I am that I did not marry that man!" said a young lady not long ago as she watched a passing figure. "How handsome I thought he was and how infatuated I was with him! Fortunately, just then I went to B—— to make a visit," naming a large city, "and my little 18-year-old country ideas of men changed. I can see now that I should have been miserable with that man, and I cannot be too thankful that I was taken away from my folly in the nick of time!"

But many a girl has not been "taken away in the nick of time," and every woman can guess something of the misery which such girls have endured, however faithfully they may have labored to make the best of their situation.

Give the girls a chance. Widen their horizon, dispel their sentimentality, and do not shut them away from young men of their own station in life. Then we shall hear less about "runaway marriages."—Ladies' Home Journal.

Corsets and Cosmetics.

The Dubois county, Indiana, teachers' institute, recently in session, passed the following resolution: Resolved, That we are in favor of and ask that a thorough course of instruction on the effects of tight lacing and painting the face with injurious cosmetics be introduced in the public schools, and that we, as teachers, denounce tight lacing, of chewing gum, of using wire, cotton and sawdust pads to deceive in regard to beauty of form, and of bustles to occupy unnecessary room in every conveyance, and render necessary the use of much expensive material for dresses, and these habits are not worthy of imitation by the children of Eve, believing that "nature unadorned is most beautiful."

Leather Collars.

A novelty sold by the swell London ladies' tailors will soon appear on this side. These are leather collars and cuffs, which come in varying shades of brown, green, red, and also in black, and which are ornamented with fancy stitching. The cuffs are about three inches deep. As accompaniments to these are arabesque designs in leather for dresses, while traveling dresses are trimmed around the edge of the skirt with broad strips of black, gray and brown leather.—Boston Beacon.

Facts for the Ladies.

Many of the theatre hats have long follow-me-love streamers in the back made of velvet ribbon half an inch wide.

Keep your tongue in your mouth if you don't want chapped lips.

It is said that lemon juice will make the hands soft and smooth.

There is no better hair dressing than brandy. Two applications a week followed by a thorough brushing, will cleanse the scalp and burnish the hair.

Embroideries are not used on the choicest underwear. Lace trimmed goods are first choice.

For the bridal bed fashion has designed square pillows covered with blue or old rose covered silk, over which cases of Medicis lace are drawn.

Ice-cream made with chestnut meal is the heaviest, but the most fashionable variety.

Mrs. Leland Stanford is said to have the most valuable private collection of diamonds in the world. One of the necklaces is worth $600,000.

The richest woman in Wisconsin is Mrs. Alexander Mitchell, whose husband left her an estate worth many millions. She is the widow of the late President of the Milwaukee & St. Paul Road.

Concealment is the emphasis of beauty, and so if you have pretty teeth cultivate a quick, short smile; dress your perfect arm in net, gauze, jet or lace sleeves; scorn a collar if your throat is the column of sinuous grace, but adopt a fragile ruching; if you have been told that your eyes are brilliant use the mystic shelter of a broad-brimmed hat or a fine transparent veil for their coquetry, and never show the charm that can be suggested. The tip of a slipper is far prettier than the whole foot, and better the inch of passementerie or petticoat than the deep flounce.

Fashions in a Flash.

Silk fringes are being revived again.

A baby's outfit costs anywhere from $10 to $500.

Sailor hats of felt are among the winter novelties.

The color of the newest note paper is olive green.

Cloth walking dresses should have bonnets to match.

Black dresses were never in higher favor than at present.

The brocades used for cloaks this season are in very large designs.

A fringe half a yard wide edged the corsage of a recently imported dress.

The idea that flowers must not be worn out of season only exists in England.

Alpaca is a favorite fabric for dresses.

Long wraps are in vogue for general wear.

Ribbons are used as freely as ever for trimming.

The Tyrolean is the newest shape for gentlemen's hats.

Astrakhan, seal and plush are to be used for coat trimmings.

Brooches are the favorite ornaments among Algerian women.

Rough wool goods have the preference over smooth this season.

Long cloaks, of a material suitable for autumn wear, have made their appearance.

Three-quarter long, close-fitting coats have again appeared, after spending some time among old-fashioned relics of years ago.

Some of the new wraps are shaped like capes in the back, and barely reach to the waist, but they are not long enough in front to touch the edge of the dress.

HAPPINESS OF THE OLD.

The Serene Contentment of an Old Age Free From Envy and Selfishness.

The old are notoriously strong in matters of judgment, even though their knees may be weak, says All the Year Round. What so pleasurable as to sit in the seat of the censor? Is a man ever too old for the bench? The longevity and the haleness of our more considerable lawyers are convincing testimony to the advantageousness of their position. But every old man stands towards the community at large like a judge towards his criminals. Each year broadens his horizon, extends his pleasure and his pastime. Methuselah was a man immensely to be envied. What varied lore, what an endless series of graduated pictures he must have stored within him as the centuries passed and left him high and dry among his pigmy fellow men! Nothing is easier, it may be said, than to cast together the evils which commonly wait upon old age and thereby to prove that it is absurd to suppose that happiness can exist in the midst of them. Of course nothing is easier than to catalogue these possible afflictions; but, on the other hand, I contend with my betters, that happiness, contentment, or what you please to call the "summum bonum" we strive for, is quite independent of most of these afflictions. The prudent person, when old, expects to be tried in this way. He is prepared, and that is half the battle. Nor must it be forgotten that even as his energies have waned with his increase of years so also his body has changed into a condition well suited to bear physical trials which in his youth would have been insufferable. As a stripling he grumbled without ceasing when a toothache or a sprained ankle kept him within doors; as an octogenarian the chair to which he is confined for a good many hours of the day is to him by far the most comfortable place in all the world; nor would he exchange it for the Pope's throne, if the throne were only to be won by a journey to Rome.

But to return to the moral aspect of the matter. Is it not a fact that a good man's goodness increases as he grows older? There is nothing in the world more venerable and lovable than a good old man or woman. Surely that is much, for are not respect and affection just the two things for which we fight hardest during the fighting part of our career? And they may be acquired by the aged without effort.

"It is only older people, after all, who are quite unselfish, and feel the greatest pleasure in witnessing the happiness of others." Miss Thackery was right when she wrote this. It constitutes the keenest joy of reverend old age; a joy to which the wild intoxicants, which in youth we call pleasures, are as nothing at all. It is almost impossible, made as we are, for the young to be disinterestedly happy in the happiness of others. Envy and jealousy are ever on the alert to mar such a divine possibility. But the old are doubly gladdened by the visible joy of others. They are generous enough to rejoice because others are profited. And—this is not cynicism—they often find cause to congratulate themselves that their own snug tranquility is not in peril of being disturbed by the like boisterous agents of felicity. It is for their peace and resignation that I most admire the old. They have attained Nirvana. The world's game, confessedly not an amazing one, is known to them. They are on the heights of Pisgah, whereas we are warring on the plain, or groaning in the valley about the tedium of our days.

Kisses by Mail.

United States Mail: A young postmaster of a village post-office was hard at work when a gentle tap was heard upon the door, and in stepped a bashful maiden of 16 with a money order which she desired cashed. She handed it to the official with a bashful smile who, after closely examining it, handed her the money it called for. At the same time he asked her if she had read what was written on the margin of the order.

"No, I have not," she replied, "for I can not make it out. Will you please read it for me?"

The young postmaster read as follows: "I send you $3 and a dozen kisses."

Glancing at the bashful girl, he said: "Now, I have paid you the money, and I suppose you want the kisses."

"Yes," she said, "if he has sent me any kisses I want them, too."

It is hardly necessary to say that the balance of the order was promptly paid, and in scientific manner at that, and eminently satisfactory to the country maiden, for she went out of the office smacking her lips as if there was a taste upon them she never encountered before.

After she arrived home she remarked to her mother: "Eh, mother, but this post-office system of ours is a great thing, developing more and more every year, and each new feature added seems to be the best. Jimmie sent me a dozen kisses along with the money order, and the postmaster gave me twenty. It beats the special delivery system all hollow."

A Machine for Wrapping Oranges.

The Remington Arms Company is manufacturing for Humphrey Williams, of Yorkville, Oneida county, a large number of machines for packing or wrapping oranges in papers for shipping. The machines are simple and comparatively inexpensive; but one will do the work of three persons at least. They will wrap nicely in papers 2,500 oranges per hour. The machine is about three feet long by three high and 18 inches wide, not including the cylinder for feeding or the endless chain carrier, which is about seven feet long, and operates like a straw carrier in a threshing machine, and carries the fruit after the wrapping operation to bins or boxes. The machine is operated by a crank. The fruit passes from the cylinder down a slide, one at a time, into a wire cup, which opens and drops the orange on a square paper cut by the machine from a roller; then passes through an aperture which wraps the paper and trims it; then the fruit passes on to the carrier. The operation is both simple and rapid.—Utica Herald.

A strange atmospheric phenomenon was observed at Pittsfield, Mass., Monday afternoon. The sun was sinking towards the horizon and the sky was hazy, when a brilliant rainbow, a quarter circle, appeared in the zenith, being visible an hour.

TRAIN WRECKERS' WORK.

Human Fiends Wreck a Train and Kill Three Men.

An Indianapolis despatch of Friday says: A north-bound freight train on the Lake Erie and Western Railway was wrecked at Kokomo at 4 o'clock this morning. The engine, with eight or ten cars, was thrown from the track. Twelve oil tanks exploded in quick succession, setting fire to the box cars attached. Two cars of merchandise and four of coal were consumed. Engineer Mahl, fireman Edward Burnell and head brakeman John Spelfman were thrown beneath the oil cars and burned to a crisp. The accident was the work of wreckers, this being the third attempt made in that vicinity within the last two months. The train employees killed lived at Peru, Ind.

Oarsman vs. Actor.

Edward Hanlan, the oarsman, and Edward Hanlon, the actor, have got into a peculiar tangle about a money transaction. It dates back to the time when the oarsman was about to leave for Australia to row Beach. Hanlan was to have received £100 from Beach for expenses. He received, however, £140 and could not understand how it came. The money, it appears, was really sent to actor Hanlon, who was not as well known in America just then as the oarsman. Actor Hanlon now seeks to recover the £140. The oarsman says he is willing to pay £40, but the other £100, he says, should be paid by Editor Busbey, of Turf, Field and Farm, who, Hanlan says, received the money and also the £100 that was really intended for him.

Got a Pension, No Doubt.

First Boy—Was any of your folks hurt in the war?

Second Boy—Yes. My uncle was knocked down by an explosion of an ammunition waggon.

First Boy—That's nothing! My father was shot twice in his horse.

"He most lives who thinks the most,
Acts the noblest, feels the best,
And he whose heart beats quickest
Lives the longest, lives in one hour
More than in years do some whose Fat blood sleeps as it slips along their veins."

These lines describe that condition of perfect health which all men and women wish to enjoy. To be able to think clearly, to incline to do noble acts, to live long and joyously, we must be free from the domination of disease. By taking Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery we may, by purifying the blood, escape consumption, general debility, and weakness, and all blood and skin diseases, and verify the truth of poetry as well as fact. It is guaranteed to cure in all cases of diseases for which it is recommended, or money paid for it will be refunded.

That's the Fun—For the Spectators.

"Well, I can't see any fun in attendin' court," said an observant old lady. "Every time a witness goes to tell anything that's got anything to do with the case, all the lawyers jump up and holler, and the jedge rules the testimony out."

My love was like a lily fair,
Low drooping in the sultry air,
My heart was rent with grief and care.
I loved her well.

But lo! The wonder grows and grows;
My love's now like a blooming rose.
How bright her face with beauty glows,
I dare not tell.

The wandering bee would stop to sip,
The nectar of her perfect lip.
'Twas Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription wrought the spell.

National Woman's Christian Temperance Union meets in Battery "D" Chicago, Nov. 8th, 1889, and continues through the 12th. This Society represents over 2,000,000 earnest-hearted women devoted to works of philanthropy along lines that build up the temperance reform.

A gentleman was out shooting near Totnes, England, the other day, when he had the misfortune to shoot his dog. For a moment he was too much overcome to see what damage he had done, and before he had recovered himself the animal, a black retriever, had come up to him, bringing in its mouth its own tail, which had been shot clean off.

CASH STORE.

We sell everything on strictly cash principles. Are often asked by our customers, why don't you give credit, would sell double the goods? Our answer is, we consider it to the customers' advantage to buy on the CASH SYSTEM even if he has to borrow the money for a short time to do so. In the first place, he knows exactly what he is doing and goes home contented, feeling assured there would be no long bill coming to him with a hundred and one different articles on it which he thinks never came into the house. In the second place, he will be more careful in his purchases and buy only what is most needed, doing without a hundred and one different articles which are useless and extravagant. In the third place, he can buy from ten to fifteen per cent less at a cash house, than any credit house in the Dominion

Our Stock consists of Dry Goods, Groceries, Boots and Shoes, Crockery, Glassware, in fact most everything of general merchandise, excepting Hardware and Stoves.

We can give you no conception of our prices, but would solicit a call, guaranteeing to satisfy the closest purchaser.

SAN FRANCISCO.

LETTER NO. 3.

Situated on a rocky bluff 300 feet above the ocean, and right at the edge of it, these grounds cover 25 acres, and are enclosed by a lattice fence about twenty feet high, with an upper and lower gateway. At the upper gate on either side a huge lion lies crouched on a marble block. Over the arched gateway are several life sized statues. Passing through the gateway we turn to our right and enter a little room where we register our names. You are not allowed to carry the smallest parcel through the grounds, so if you have any they will have to be left on a small table inside the gate until you return. This is to prevent the grounds from becoming littered with rubbish as everything is perfection. The words "Welcome all to Sutro Heights 1889" may be seen growing in seven different shades of green moss. Here again may be seen

Gorgeous flowers in the sunlight shining,
Blossoms flaunting in the eye of day,
Tremulous leaves with soft and silver lining,
Buds that only open to decay.

In every nook, at every corner, under trees, may be seen a white figure gleaming, of man, beast or bird. There are between two hundred and fifty and three hundred pieces of statuary on the grounds—sculptors, painters, poets, musicians, gods, godesses, even to Satyr himself.

On the face of the cliff overlooking the ocean is a terrace enclosed with a fence of large blocks of stone with iron rods between. On each side of the blocks stand alternately a large urn with flowers and a life sized figure—thirty-two in all. Going down a flight of stone steps you reach a second terrace which is used for driving around as well as promenading. Here you will find seats hewn out of the solid rock in the shape of toadstools. In every available niche in the face of the rock is a piece of statuary, and wherever there is earth enough to give root to flowers and vines there they may be seen growing.

I wish I could do this place justice in my description of it, but that is beyond me. To stand on this cliff and gaze out over the ocean for the first time, watching the billows fall and rise, listening to the almost deafening roar and beating of the waves against the rocks, sending the spray into the air, seeing the ships sailing past, some on their outward bound trips to foreign shores, others on their return, we are led to say.

Ah! what pleasant visions haunt me
As I gaze upon the sea,
All the old romantic legends,
All my dreams come back to me,
Till my soul is full of longing
For the secret of the sea,
And the heart of the great ocean
Sends a thrilling pulse through me.

Just here let me say a little about the wonderful growth of plants. The house plants that are matured with such care in Ontario, here grow into immense trees and bushes. All the readers of The Advance know what great care has to be taken of such plants as heliotrope, fuschias and calla lillies. It is quite common to see heliotrope and fuschias grow ten feet high, covered with thousands of blossoms. All plants grow out of doors here the year round, and are almost perpetual bloomers. Roses may be had at almost any time of the year. They are beyond description, growing to the tops of the houses and some of the roses measuring six inches across the top. Calla lillies grow here something like burdocks do there. Around every house where there is ground enough to give them root will be seen flowers growing. In fact it may be said every one cultivates flowers.

Just below Sutro Heights 100 feet, and jutting out into the ocean farther, is a point of rock called Point Lobos on which the cliff house stands. Within 200 yards of this are several rugged rocks projecting from the sea, which are covered every day with seals, near enough to be seen, and their barking distinctly heard above the roar of the ocean. Many of these are very large, some of them measuring 11 feet in length. No one is ever allowed to go near them or in any way molest them.

From the cliff house you can take a stroll along the beach and gather shells in the coves when the tide is out, and if fortunate as I have been, may have the pleasure of seeing the life boat launched. However, this is not promised for a certainty, as many who have lived here all their lives have not had that pleasure, I have been told. It was quite an interesting sight. Just as the crew had got into their positions and pushed out from the shore, a large wave struck the keel, standing it on its end perfectly upright in the air. Nevereheless, the crew kept their positions, and did not at all appear to be discomfited. When they got a little farther from the shore the boat appeard to fly over the billows like a bird.

This place is just a few miles beyond the Golden Gate, and outside of the harbor bar. The Golden Gate is the only way of exit or inress into the harbor. This is a channel between two islands and is five miles long and over a mile wide. The bay is about thirty miles long and six wide on an average. It is dotted with islands. Goat Island lying right in front of the city is owned by the Goverument and used for marine supplies. Alcatraz is another where the military forces are stationed. Angel Island, a picturesque spot, where the infantry troops are. Then the Presidio on the mainland is another military fort, overlooking the Golden Gate entrance. The harbor is a beautiful sight with its forests of masts of all nations lying at anchor, or gliding calmly over the placid waters, man of war vessels of all kinds. I had the pleasure of a trip around the bay visiting the different places of interest and hearing a great deal about the different crafts lying at anchor, then through the Golden Gate, over the harbor bar and out on the great Pacific. This was enjoyed beyond description.

The harbor is one of the largest and finest in the world. There is no direct communication from the outer world with the city except by water. There is only one line of railway coming into it, and that is only a short line running south about 250 miles. Every other line runs into the city of Oakland across the bay. From there there they have to cross by boat.

To be Continued.

School Matters.

MR. EDITOR.—Will you kindly print the following communication from the Inspector. I think it would be only ordinary justice to the teachers of our school to do so.

"I have much pleasure in reporting the standing of the school to be one of the highest in my inspectorate. In all classes examined the pupils acquitted themselves well. The harmony existing between teachers and pupils is one of the best possible signs of advancement. The order maintained in both divisions continue as on former occasions. Better could not be desired. The progress of some classes is marked. Find the reading constantly improving—the proficiency in language—although some pupils (one or two noticed) are somewhat slow in the latter. Probably a dislike of the subject or irregular attendance is the cause. Am glad Mr. Irwin is re-engaged for next year. He is certainly one of the best teachers in this county. N. W. Campbell, Inspector."

I was more than pleased to have such an impartial testimony to the proficiency of our school from so competent a judge. More than this cannot reasonably expected, and I sincerley hope that when the promotion examinations take place in December the good points will show themselves. I am glad upon other grounds, because it corroborates the position I hold, viz., the unreasonableness to employ a teacher qualified to teach Mr. Irwin's department with an increased salary to teach the same classes which Miss Ganton, holding a third class certificate, with no previous experience, has so successfully done. Under the supervision of the head teacher, twenty of such non-professional teachers could be got to do the work amply, and no doubt to the satisfaction of all concerned, without any increase of expenses. I am heartily sorry that any discord exists in those matters, but I cannot go back from the principles adopted by the deputation who waited on me on the last school meeting morning and asked me to carry out, if possible. At present I have failed, but promise the ratepayers, that if my presence on the Board be a cause for increased taxation, as is alleged by many, I will seek the first opportunity to get out of the way. I never sought the position and do not care to keep it, but will, fearless of any, discharge my duty while in it.

When Johnny Gets His Gun.

There's coming up the path of Time a gracious epoch when
The better motives of the heart shall rule the deeds of men;
When politicians cease with lies to mend their party fence,
And office-holders heed the wish of their constituents;
When every one shall have the thought to watch the word they say;
When all our deeds and motives shall be open as the day;
When thieving, trickery, deceit and fraud we shall have done,
In that uncertain period when Johnny gets his gun.

The men will cease to smoke and chew and drink and rudely swear,
And girls be taught to bake and mend and cease to bang their hair,
And he who peddles milk will put no water in his can,
While then the hackman, even, may become an honest man.
How gladly we shall greet the day when these things come to pass!
But there is still one cloud of doubt in hope's fair sky, alas!
New York will still be found with all her monuments undone,
They'll still be just as they are now, when Johnny gets his gun.

AN AMERICAN GIRL.

"Of course, it was very little," hesitated Miss Belinda; "but—but I could not help seeing that he was drawing comparisons, as it were. Octavia was teaching Mr. Poppleton to play croquet, and she was rather exhilarated, and perhaps exhibited more—freedom of manner, in an innocent way—quite in an innocent, thoughtless way—than is exactly customary, and I saw Mr. Barold glance from her to Lucia, who stood near; and when I said, 'You are thinking of the contrast between them,' he answered, 'Yes, they differ very greatly, it is true'; and of course I knew that my poor Octavia could not have the advantage in his eyes. She feels this herself, I know. She shocked me, the other day, beyond expression by telling me that she had asked him if he thought she was really fast, and that she was sure he did. Poor child; she evidently did not comprehend the dreadful significance of such terms."

"A man like Francis Barold does understand their significance," said Lady Theobald, "and it is to be deplored that your niece cannot be taught what her position in society will be if such a reputation attaches itself to her. The men of the present day fight shy of such characters."

This dread clause so impressed poor Miss Belinda by its solemnity that she could not forbear repeating it to Octavia afterwards, though it is to be regretted that it did not produce the effect that she had hoped.

"Well, I must say," she observed, "that if some men fought a little shyer than they do, I shouldn't mind it. You always do have about half a dozen dangling around, who only bore, and who will keep asking you to go to places, and sending you bouquets, and asking you to dance, when they can't dance at all, and tear your dress, and stand on your feet. If they would 'fight shy,' it would be splendid."

To Miss Belinda, who certainly had never been guilty of the indecorum of having any member of the stronger sex "dangling about" at all, this was very trying.

"My dear," she said, "don't say 'you always have'; it—it really seems to make it so personal."

Octavia turned around and fixed her eyes wonderingly upon her blushing countenance. For a moment she made no remark, a marvellous thought shaping itself slowly in her mind.

"Aunt Belinda," she said, at length, did anybody ever——."

"Ah, no, my dear. No, no, I assure you!" cried Miss Belinda, in the greatest possible trepidation. "Ah, dear, no! Such—such things rarely—very rarely happen in—in Slowbridge—and besides, I couldn't possibly have thought of it. I couldn't, indeed!"

She was so overwhelmed with maidenly confusion at the appaling thought, that she did not recover herself for half an hour at least. Octavia, feeling that it would not be safe to pursue the subject, only uttered one word of comment:

"Gracious!"

CHAPTER XIX.

AN EXPERIMENT.

Much to her own astonishment, Lucia found herself allowed new liberty. She was permitted to spend the afternoon frequently with Octavia, and, on several occasions, that young lady and Miss Bassett were invited to partake of tea at Oldclough in company with no other guest than Francis Barold.

"I don't know what it means, and I think it must mean something," said Lucia to Octavia, "but it is very pleasant. I never was allowed to be so intimate with any one before."

"Perhaps," suggested Octavia, sagely, "she thinks that, if you see me often enough, you will get sick of me, and it will be a lesson to you."

"The more I see of you," answered Lucia, with a serious little air, "the fonder I am of you. I understand you better. You are not at all like what I thought you at first, Octavia."

"But I don't know that there's much to understand in me."

"There is a great deal to understand in you," she replied. "You are a puzzle to me often. You seem so frank, and yet one knows so little about you, after all. For instance," Lucia went on, "who would imagine that you are so affectionate?"

"Am I affectionate?" she asked.

"Yes," answered Lucia, "I am sure you are very affectionate. I have found it out gradually. You would suffer things for any one you loved."

Octavia thought the matter over.

"Yes," she said at length, "I would."

"You are very fond of Miss Bassett," proceeded Lucia, as if arraigning her at the bar of justice. You are very fond of your father, and I am sure there are other people you are very fond of—very fond of, indeed."

Octavia pondered seriously again.

"Yes, there are," she remarked; "but no one would care about them here—and so I'm not going to make a fuss. You don't want to make a fuss over people you l—— like."

"You don't," said Lucia. "You are like Francis Barold, in one way—but you are altogether different, in another. Francis Barold does not wish to show emotion, and he is so determined to hedge himself around that one can't help suspecting that he is always guarding himself against one. He always seems to be resenting interference; but you don't appear to care at all, and so it is not natural that one should suspect you. I did not suspect you."

"What do suspect me of now?"

"Of thinking a great deal," answered Lucia affectionately. "And of being very clever and very good."

Octavia was silent for a few moments.

"I think," she said, after the pause "I think you'll find that's its a mistake."

"No, I shall not," returned Lucia, quite glowing with enthusiasm. "And I know I shall learn a great deal from you."

This was such a startling proposition that Octavia felt decidedly uncomfortable. She flushed rosy red.

"I'm the one who ought to learn things, I think," she said. "I'm always doing things that frighten Aunt Belinda, and you know how the rest regard me."

"Octavia," said Lucia, very naively indeed, "suppose we try to help each other. If you will tell me when I am wrong, I will try to—to have the courage to tell you. That will be good practice for me. What I most want is courage and frankness, and I am sure it will take courage to make up my mind to tell you of your—of your mistake."

Octavia regarded her with mingled admiration and respect.

"I think that's a splendid idea," she said.

"Are you sure," faltered Lucia, "are you sure you won't mind the things I may have to say? Really, they are quite little things in themselves—hardly worth mentioning ——."

"Tell me one of them, right now," said Octavia, point-blank.

"Oh, no!" exclaimed Lucia, starting. "I'd rather not—just now."

"Well," commented Octavia, "that sounds as if they must be pretty unpleasant. Why don't you want to? They will be quite as bad to-morrow. And to refuse to tell me one is a bad beginning. It looks as if you were frightened, and it isn't good practice for you to be frightened at such a little thing."

Lucia felt convicted. She made an effort to regain her composure.

"No, it is not," she said. "But that is always the way. I am continually telling myself that I will be courageous and candid, and the first time anything happens, I fail. I will tell you one thing."

She stopped short here, and looked at Octavia guiltily.

"It is something—I think I would do if—if I were in your place," Lucia stammered. "A very little thing indeed."

"Well?" remarked Octavia, anxiously.

Lucia lost her breath, caught it again, and proceeded cautiously, and with blushes at her own daring.

"If I were in your place," she said, "I think—that, perhaps—only perhaps, you know—I would not wear—my hair—quite so low down—over my forehead."

Octavia sprang from her seat, and ran to the pier glass over the mantel. She glanced at the reflection of her own startled, pretty face, and then, putting her hand to the soft blonde "bang" which met her brows, turned to Lucia.

"Isn't it becoming?" she asked breathlessly.

"Oh, yes!" Lucia answered. "Very."

Octavia started.

"Then why wouldn't you wear it?" she cried. "What do you mean?"

Lucia felt her position truly a delicate one. She locked her hands, and braced herself; but she blushed vividly.

"It may sound rather silly, when I tell you why, Octavia," she said; "but I really do think it is a sort of reason. You know, in those absurb pictures of actresses, bangs always seem to be the principal feature. I saw some in the shop windows, when I went to Harriford with grandmamma. And they were such dreadful women—some of them—and had so very few clothes on, that I can't help thinking I shouldn't like to look like them, and——"

"Does it make me look like them?"

"Oh, very little!" answered Lucia; "very little indeed, of course: but——"

"But it's the same thing, after all," put in Octavia. "That's what you mean."

"It is so very little," faltered Lucia, that—that perhaps it isn't a reason."

Octavia looked at herself in the glass again.

"It isn't a very good reason," she remarked, "but I suppose it will do."

She paused, and looked Lucia in the face.

"I don't think that's a little thing," she said. To be told you look like an opera bouffe actress."

"I did not mean to say so," cried Lucia, filled with the most poignant distress. "I beg your pardon, indeed I—oh dear! I was afraid you wouldn't like it. I felt that it was taking a great liberty."

"I don't like it," answered Octavia; "but that can't be helped. I didn't exactly suppose I should. But I wasn't going to say anything about your hair when I began," glancing at poor Lucia coiffure, "though I suppose I might."

"You might say about a thousand things about it!" cried Lucia, piteously. "I know that mine is not only in bad taste, but it is ugly and unbecoming."

"Yes," said Octavia, cruelly, "it is."

"And yours is neither the one nor the other," protested Lucia. "You know I told you it was pretty, Octavia."

Octavia walked over to the table, upon which stood Miss Belinda's work-basket, and took therefrom a small and gleaming pair of scissors, retuning to the mantel glass with them.

"How short shall I cut it?" she demanded.

"Oh!" exclaimed Lucia, "don't—don't."

For answer, Octavia raised the scissors, and gave a snip. It was a savage snip, and half the length and width of her love-locks fell on the mantel; then she gave another snip, and the other half fell.

Lucia scarcely dared to breathe.

For a moment, Octavia stood gazing at herself, with pale face and dilated eyes. Then suddenly the folly of the deed she had done seem to reveal itself to her.

"Oh!" she cried out, "Oh, how diabolical it looks!"

She turned upon Lucia.

"Why did you make me do it?" she exclaimed. "It's all your fault—every bit of it"; and flinging the scissors to the other end of the room, she threw herself into a chair, and burst into tears.

Lucia's anguish of mind was almost more than she could bear. For at least three minutes, she felt herself a criminal of the deepest dye; after the three minutes had elapsed, however, she began to reason, and called to mind the fact that she was failing as usual under her crisis.

"This is being a coward again," she said to herself. "It is worse than to have said nothing. It is true that she will look more refined, now one can see a little of her forehead, and it is cowardly to be afraid to stand firm when I really think so. I—yes, I will say something to her."

"Octavia," she began, aloud, "I am sure you are making a mistake again." This as decidedly as possible, which was not very decidely. "You—you look very much—nicer,"

"I look ghastly!" said Octavia, who began to feel rather absurd.

"You do not. Your forehead—you have the prettiest forehead I ever saw, Octavia," said Lucia, eagerly, "and your eyebrows are perfect. I—wish you would look at yourself again."

Rather to her surprise, Octavia began to laugh under cover of her handerchief; reaction had set in, and, though the laugh was a trifle hysterical, it was still a laugh. Next she gave her eyes a final little dab, and rose to go to the glass again. She looked at herself, touched up the short, waving fringe left on her forehead, and turned to Lucia, with a resigned expression.

"Do you think that any one who was used to seeing it the other way would—would think I looked horrid?" she inquired, anxiously.

"They would think you prettier—a great deal," Lucia answered, earnestly. "Don't you know, Octavia, that nothing could be really unbecoming to you? You have that kind of face."

For a few seconds, Octavia seem to lose herself in thought of a speculative nature.

"Jack always said so," she remarked, at length.

"Jack?" repeated Lucia, timidly.

Octavia roused herself, and smiled with candid sweetness.

"He is some one I knew in Nevada," she explained. "He worked in father's mine once."

"You must have known him very well," suggested Lucia, somewhat awed.

"I did," she replied calmly. "Very well."

She tucked away her pocket-handkerchief in the jaunty pocket at the back of her basque, and returned to her chair. Then she turned again to Lucia.

"Well," she said, "I think you have found out that you were mistaken, haven't you, dear? Suppose you tell me of something else."

Lucia colored.

"No," she answered, "that is enough for to-day."

CHAPTER XX.

PECULIAR TO NEVADA.

Whether or not Lucia was right in accusing Octavia's Bassett of being clever, and thinking a great deal, is a riddle which those who are interested in her must unravel as they read: but whether the surmise was correct or incorrect, it seemed possible that she had thought a little after the interview. When Barold saw her next, he was struck by a slight but distinctly definable change he recognized in her dress and coiffure. Her pretty hair had a rather less "professional" appearance; he had the pleasure of observing, for the first time, how very white her forehead was, and how delicate the arch of her eyebrows; her dress had a novel air of simplicity, and the diamond rings were nowhere to be seen.

"She's better dressed than usual," he said to himself. "And she's always well dressed—rather too well dressed, fact is, for a place like this. This sort of thing is in better form, under the circumstances."

It was so much "better form," and he so far approved of it, that he quite thawed, and was very amiable and very entertaining indeed.

Octavia was entertaining, too. She asked several most interesting questions.

"Do you think," she inquired, "that it is bad taste to wear diamonds?"

"My mother wears them—occasionally."

"Have you any sisters?"

"No."

"Any cousins—as young as I am?"

"Ya-as."

"Do they wear them?"

"I must admit," he replied, "that they don't. In the first place, you know, they haven't any, and, in the second, I am under the impression that Lady Beauchamp—their mamma, you know—wouldn't permit it if they had."

"Wouldn't permit it!" said Octavia. "I suppose they always do as she tells them?"

He smiled a little.

"They would be very courageous young women if they didn't," he remarked.

"What would she do if they tried it?" she inquired. "She couldn't beat them."

"They will never try it," he answered, dryly. "And, though I have never seen her beat them, or heard their lamentations under chastisment, I should not like to say that Lady Beauchamp could not do anything. She is a very determined person—for a gentlewoman."

Octavia laughed.

"You are joking," she said.

"Lady Beauchamp is a serious subject for jokes," he responded. "My cousins think so, at least."

"I wonder if she is as bad as Lady Theobald," Octavia reflected aloud. "She says I have no right to wear diamonds at all, until I am married. But I don't mind Lady Theobald," she added, as a cheerful afterthought. "I am not fond enough of her to care about what she says."

"Are you fond of any one?" Barold inquired, speaking with a languid air, but, at the same time glancing at her with some slight interest, from under his eyelids.

"Lucia says I am," she returned, with the calmness of a young person who wished to regard the matter from an unembarrassed point of view. "Lucia says I am affectionate."

"Ah!" deliberately. "Are you?"

She turned and looked at him serenely.

"Should you think so?" she asked.

This was making such a personal matter of the question that he did not exactly enjoy it. It was certainly not "good form" to pull a man up in such cool style.

"Really," he replied, "I—ah—have had no opportunity of judging."

He had not the slightest intention of being amusing, but to his infinite disgust he discovered as soon as he spoke that she was amused. She laughed outright, and evidently only checked herself because he looked so furious. In consideration for his feelings she assumed an air of mild but preternatural seriousness.

"No," she remarked, "that is true—you haven't, of course."

He was silent. He did not enjoy being amusing at all, and he made no pretence of appearing to submit to the indignity calmly.

She bent forward a little.

"Ah!" she exclaimed, "you are mad again—I mean you are vexed. I am always vexing you."

There was a hint of appeal in her voice, which rather pleased him, but he had no intention of relenting at once.

"I confess I am at a loss to know why you laughed," he said.

"Are you," she asked, "really?"—letting her eyes rest upon him anxiously for a moment. Then she actually gave vent to a little sigh. "We look at things so differently, that's it," she said.

"I suppose it is," he responded, still chillingly.

In spite of this, she suddenly assumed a comparatively cheerful aspect. A happy thought occurred to her.

"Lucia would beg your pardon," she said. "I am learning good manners from Lucia. Suppose I beg your pardon."

"It is quite unnecessary," he replied.

"Lucia wouldn't think so," she said. "And why shouldn't I be as well behaved as Lucia? I beg your pardon."

He felt rather absurd, and yet somewhat mollified. She had a way of looking at him, sometimes, when she had been unpleasant, which rather soothed him. In fact, he had found of late, a little to his private annoyance, that it was very easy for her either to soothe or disturb him.

And now, just as Octavia had settled down into one of the prettiest and least difficult of her moods, there came a knock at the front door, which, being answered by Mary Anne, was found to announce the curate of St. James.

Enter, consequently, the Rev. Arthur Poppleton,—blushing, a trifle timorous, perhaps, but happy beyond measure to find himself in Miss Belinda's parlor again, with Miss Belinda's niece.

Perhaps the least possible shade of his joyousness died out when he caught sight of Mr. Francis Barold, and certainly Mr. Francis Barold was not at all delighted to see him.

"What does that fellow want?" that gentleman was saying, inwardly. "What does he come simpering and turning pink here for? Why doesn't he go and see some of his old women, and read tracts to them? That's his business."

Octavia's manner towards her visitor formed a fresh grievance for Barold. She treated the curate very well indeed. She seemed glad to see him, she was wholly at her ease with him, she made no trying remarks to him, she never stopped to fix her eyes upon him in that inexplicable style, and she did not laugh when there seemed nothing to laugh at. She was so gay and good-humored that the Reverend Arthur Poppleton beamed and flourished under her treatment, and forgot to change color, and even ventured to talk a good deal and make divers quite presentable little jokes.

"I should like to know," thought Barold, growing sulkier as the others grew merrier—"I should like to know what she finds so interesting in him, and why she chooses to treat him better than she treats me—for she certainly does treat him better."

It was hardly fair, however, that he should complain; for, at times, he was treated extremely well; and his intimacy with Octavia progressed quite rapidly. Perhaps, if the truth were told, it was always himself who was the first means of checking it, by some sudden prudent instinct which led him to feel that perhaps he was in rather a delicate position, and had better not indulge in too much of a good thing. He had not been an eligible and unimpeachably desirable parti for ten years without acquiring some of that discretion which is said to be the better part of valor. The matter-of-fact air with which Octavia accepted his attentions caused him to pull himself up sometimes. If he had been Brown, or Jones, or even Robinson, she could not have appeared to regard them as more entirely natural. When—he had gone so far, once or twice—he had deigned to make a more than usually agreeable speech to her, it was received with none of that charming sensitive tremor to which he had been accustomed. Octavia neither blushed nor dropped her eyes.

It did not add to Barold's satisfaction to find her as cheerful and ready to be amused by a mild little curate, who blushed and stammered, and was neither brilliant, graceful, nor distinguished. Could not Octavia see the wide difference between the two?

Regarding the matter in this light, and watching Octavia as she encouraged her visitor, and laughed at his jokes, and never once tripped him up by asking him a startling question, did not, as already has been said, improve Mr. Francis Barold's temper, and by the time his visit was over, he had lapsed into his coldest and most haughty manner. As soon as Miss Belinda entered, and engaged Mr. Poppleton for a moment, he rose and crossed the little room to Octavia's side.

"I must bid you good-afternoon," he said.

Octavia did not rise.

"Sit down a minute, while Aunt Belinda is talking about red flannel night-caps and lumbago," she said. "I want to ask you something. By the way, what is lumbago?"

"Is that what you wished to ask me?" he inquired, stiffly.

"No. I just thought of that. Have you ever had it, and what is it like? All the old people in Slowbridge have it, and they tell you all about it, when you see them. Aunt Belinda says so. What I wanted to ask you was different——."

"Possibly Miss Bassett might be able to tell you,' he remarked.

"About the lumbago? Well, perhaps she might. I'll ask her. Do you think it bad taste in me to wear diamonds?"

She said this with the most delightful seriousness, fixing her eyes upon him with her very prettiest look of candid appeal, as if it was the most natural thing in the world that she should apply to him for information. He felt himself faltering again. How white that bit of forehead was! How soft that blonde, waving fringe of hair! What a lovely shape her eyes were, and how large and clear, as she raised them!

"Why do you ask me?" he inquired.

"Because I think you are an unprejudiced person. Lady Theobald is not. I have confidence in you. Tell me."

There was a slight pause.

"Really," he said, after it, "I can scarcely believe that my opinion can be of any value in your eyes. I am—can only tell you that it is hardly customary in—an—in England for young people to wear a profusion of ornament."

"I wonder if I wear a profusion."

"You don't need any," he condescended. "You are too young, and—all that sort of thing."

She glanced down at her slim, unringed hands for a moment, her expression quite thoughtful.

"Lucia and I almost quarreled the other day," she said,—"at least, I almost quarreled. It isn't so nice to be told of things, after all. I must say I don't like it as much as I thought I should."

He kept his seat longer than he intended, and when he rose to go, the Reverend Arthur Poppleton was shaking hands with Miss Belinda, and so it fell out that they left the house together.

"You know Miss Octavia Bassett well, I suppose," remarked Barold, with condescension, as they passed through the gate. "You clergymen are fortunate fellows."

"I wish others knew her as well, sir," said the little gentleman, kindling. "I wish they knew her—her generosity and kindness of heart and ready sympathy with misfortune!"

"Ah!" commented Mr. Barold, twisting his mustache with somewhat of an incredulous air. This was not at all the sort of thing he had expected to hear. For his own part, it would not have occurred to him to suspect her of the possession of such desirable and orthodox qualities.

"There are those who—misunderstand her," cried the curate, warming with his subject, "who misunderstand, and—yes, and apply harsh terms to her innocent gayety and freedom of speech; if they knew her as I do, they would cease to do so."

"I should scarcely have thought——" began Barold.

"There are many who scarcely think it—if you will pardon my interrupting you," said the curate. "I think they would scarcely believe it if I felt at liberty to tell them, which I regret to say I do not. I am almost breaking my word in saying what I cannot help saying to yourself. The poor under my care are better off since she came, and there are some who have seen her more than once, though she did not go as a teacher or to reprove them for faults, and her way of doing what she did was new to them, and perhaps much less serious than they were accustomed to, and they liked it all the better."

"Ah!" commented Barold again. "Flannel-under-garments, and—that sort of thing."

"No," with much spirit, "not at all, sir, but what, as I said, they liked much better. It is not often they meet a beautiful creature who comes among them with open hands, and the natural, ungrudging way of giving which she has. Sometimes they are at a loss to understand, as well as the rest. They have been used to what is narrower and more—more exacting."

"They have been used to Lady Theobald," observed Barold, with a faint smile.

"It would not become me to—to mention Lady Theobald in any disparaging manner," replied the curate, "but the best and most charitable among us do not always carry out our good intentions in the best way. I dare say Lady Theobald would consider Miss Octavia Bassett too readily influenced, and too lavish."

"She is as generous with her money as with her diamonds, perhaps," said Barold. "Possibly the quality is peculiar to Nevada. We part here Mr. Poppleton, I believe. Good-morning."

(To be Continued).

Pillows of Paper.

All England is crazy on the subject of paper pillows. You tear the paper into very small pieces, not bigger than your finger nail, and then put them into a pillow-sack of drilling or light ticking. They are very cool for hot climates, and much superior to feather pillows. The newspapers are printing appeals for them for hospitals. Newspaper is not nice to use, as there is a disagreeable odor from printers' ink; but brown or white paper and old letters and envelopes are the best. As you tear them, stuff them into an old pillow-case, until you can get enough. The easiest way is to tear or cut the paper in stripe about half an inch wide and then tear or cut across. The finer it is the lighter it makes the pillows.

His Reasons.

Mrs. Gibblegabble—Doctor, there is something the matter with my tongue; it pains me badly at times, and I don't know what to do for it.

Physician—Place a little cotton pillow under it between meals; it may be tired and need rest.

Mrs. Gibblegabble—But I couldn't talk then.

Physician—That is why I prescribe the pillow.

Polonius and His Lost Chance.

"Polonius was a splendid bit of character work."

"Yes; but he had his drawbacks. When he started off and said, 'Neither a borrower nor a lender be,' he lost the best chance in the world to show off his wisdom."

"How's that?"

"Why, he should have gone on and said, 'but if thou must do one or t'other, let it be borrowing. There's money in it.'"—Harper's Bazar.

What They Eat.

A physician could many a queer tale unfold. One of Ottawa's leading practitioners is authority for the statement that young girls and women, but in particular the former, are addicted to peculiar practices in eating. Here are a few of the things they continually munch: Chalk, old tea leaves, blue clay, starch, clay pipes, lime, slate pencils and slate stone. They eat many other extraordinary articles and as a consequence frequently call upon the skill of the doctor.

Mrs. Leland Stanford is said to have the most valuable private collection of diamonds in the world. One of the necklaces is worth $600,000.

The richest woman in Wisconsin is Mrs Alexander Mitchell, whose husband left her an estate worth many millions. She is the widow of the late President of the Milwaukee & St. Paul Road.

—A woman of great weight died last week. She was Mrs. Price, Barnum's fat woman.

His Name is in the Papers.

The chump who tries to cross the track in front of flying trains—
His name is in the papers every day—
That is, if his acquaintances distinguish his remains,
His name is in the papers every day.

The careless hired girl, who when the kindling's wet and green,
Would hurry up the fire with a little kerosene
And give the coroner a chance his jury to convene,
Her name is in the papers every day.

The husband who goes home at night and scares his wife for fun—
His name is in the papers every day—
And quite forgets he bought and told her how to use a gun—
His name is in the papers every day.

And there's the hurried citizen who hasn't time
to wait,
But boards or leaves the train while running at a fearful rate,
And walks with crutches afterward with slow and halting gait—
His name is in the papers every day.

And there's the chap who monkeys with the buzz saw when in tune—
His name is in the papers every day.
His race very likely will be exterminated soon—
Their names are in the papers every day.

And there's his daring brother, who is still a bigger fool,
Who dies an awful death with no exception to the rule,
For he's the man who gets too near the hind leg of a mule—
His name is in the papers every day.

Too Sick to Go to School.

When bro her Jack and I were boys,
Full twenty years ago,
We never feared to go to school
Thro' storms of sleet and snow;
But summer weather made us sick—
When forests beckoned cool—
Not sick enough to feel bad,
But too sick to go to school.

On rainy days thro' seas of mud
Undauntedly we sailed,
But when the pleasant weather came,
Our constitution failed.
Or if a circus chanced to come
It found us, as a rule,
Not sick enough to feel bad,
But too sick to go to school.

Oh, often in the morning
We woke in woeful plight,
But after father went to work
Our illness all took flight.
We hunted up our fishing rods
And sought some shady pool—
Not sick enough to feel bad,
But too sick to go to school.

One day our father happened home
As we came straggling in,
And drew us gently o'er the edge
Of the potato bin.
That afternoon we sadly sat
Beneath the teacher's rule—
Quite sick enough to feel bad,
And too sick to go to school.

The Wheat Growers' Paradise.

The following are extracts from a letter received by Senator Sanford from Manitoba:

Fred. Westgate, of ½ section 24, 12, 7, between Portage and Westbourne, threshed 4,100 bushels of No. 1 hard. Weather keeping very mild.

Mr. J. T. Smith, who formerly did business in the red front store, does farming in Manitoba on an extensive scale. This year's stock at Griswold averaged ten bushels, and the yield on this Portage plains farm—500 acres—was thirty-two bushels to the acre

"The only place in Manitoba where a man without brains can make a good living at farming is on the Portage Plains." So said Mr. Waugh, of the Northwest Farmer, to a Review representative the other day. Mr. Waugh is the best authority on the Northwest farming in the Dominion.—Yours very sincerely,

WM. GARLAND.

Face a Frowning World.

Mr. Filosopher (handing his wife a twenty dollar bill)—Woman is an enigma.

Mrs. Filosopher—Thanks, dear. But why did you make that remark?

Mr. Filosopher—She will face a frowning world and cling to the man she loves through the most bitter season of trial and adversity; but she wouldn't wear a hat three weeks behind the style to save the Government.

Opposed to Scandal.

Mrs. Jason—It really is a pity that the papers have to devote so much time to scandal.

Mr. Jason—It is, indeed. By the way, did you see anything in the papers about Wickwire leaving town the other day with a married woman?

Mrs. Jason—No. Tell me about it quick. Who was she?

Mr. Jason—His wife.

Extortionists.

"Why do you call that colored man a blackmailer?"

"Because he is employed at the post-office. And that ain't the worst of it."

"No?"

"No, sir; his wife takes hush money."

"You don't say so!"

"I do. She's a child's nurse."

THE CANDIDATE.

Who comes and grasps you by the hand
And welcomes you with greeting bland
And flattery you can't withstand?
The candidate.

Who says the country's going to smash
Unless you help his side to thrash
The other side, with vote and cash?
The candidate.

Who, when his victory is won,
Will straight forget what you have done,
And look out sharp for Number One?
The candidate.

HER HEART'S REPLY.

He wooed me wildly at my feet,
I would not answer "nay;"
But, oh! the giving was so sweet,
I fain would keep the "yea."

My secret I would not impart;
His spirit guessed it when
He kissed my lips, for my glad heart
Was in my mouth just then.

It may be desirable to live to a green old age, but when you have attained it please keep away from the bunco men.

NEAR NOVEMBER.

The lowering sky, the foggy air,
Are signs which we of old remember
Hot water hissing on the bar—
This warns us we are near November
The turkey in his barnyard drear,
Struts now in all the pride of living—
The terminal of his career
Will come the week before Thanksgiving.

THE other day we noticed that Archduke John of Austria had petitioned the Emperor to strip him of his titles and dignities and make him plain John Hapsburg We now learn that John has accepted a lucrative position on the staff of the New York Herald. When this democratic prince has spent a week or two hustling after police court news and conflagrations and gets scooped two or three times by the other fellows, he will be glad to take the leading role in the Prodigal Son and return home to his titles and dukedom.

AN ATHENIAN WEDDING

Nuptials of Princess Sophie and the Duke of Sparta.

A DAY OF POMP AND SPLENDOR.

Before the Wedding.

A London Saturday morning's cable says: There are to be no fewer than 99 royal personages present at the Royal wedding in Athens to-day, including one Emperor, William of Germany, brother of the bride; two Empresses, Frederica, the bride's mother, and Augusta Victoria, her sister-in-law; two Kings, Christian of Denmark, grandfather of the groom, and George of Greece, the groom's father; two Queens, consorts of the aforementioned; two Crown Princes, besides the groom, Albert Edward of Wales, uncle of the bride, and the Czarowitz of Russia, cousin of the groom, and one potential crown prince, Albert Victor of Wales, cousin of the bride. Emperor William will be escorted by four aides-de-camp, Empress Frederick will be attended by two of the highest nobles of the German court, and the King of Denmark, the Prince of Wales and the Czarowitz will be attended by three lords each. The Duke is 31 years old and his bride is 19. The wedding presents are of enormous value, and there is every indication that the marriage will be a happy one, a rare circumstance in the annals of royal alliances. The wedding ceremony will be one of the most splendid ever witnessed. During the ceremony old Byzantine chants will be sung, and immediately after a great Te Deum will be celebrated, in which all the bishops of the country will take part in magnificent vestments. The Persæ of Æschylus will be performed to music by the hereditary Prince of Meiningen, and the Philoctetes of Sophocles, with music by Ferdinand Bender—a great knape or drinking festival—is also to be given under the direction of the rector of the Athens University, to which all Greeks who have been members of German polytechnical institutes and military and art academies are to be invited. Delegates have also been appointed from Constantinople and other Turkish towns were Greek residents are numerous, to proceed to Athens with presents and loyal wishes from the Hellenic subjects on the day of the wedding. The Sultan will be represented by a high state officer with a suite. After the wedding the Princess of Wales will visit Egypt, where great preparations are being made for their arrival, and the Emperor and Empress of Germany will visit Constantinople.

A MARVELLOUS VEIL.

In the annals of flounces and furbelows the approaching marriage of the Crown Prince of Greece, with the Princess Sophie, of Prussia, will be remembered for the exceptional beauty of the veil worn by the bride. This wondrous garment is now solemnly reported as finished by the directors of the Silesian lace schools of Urnsdorf, Steinseiffen and Seidorf, where it has been made. The design was long the subject of anxious consultations between the Empress Frederick and the designer Burghold. The foundation material is the finest Brussels tulle. This is trimmed in specially designed point Venise, with a border of point gaze, formed of 110 different masterpieces of lace work. The production of this masterpiece has uninterruptedly occupied 200 Silesian lace workers for four months.

CELEBRATING THE NUPTIALS.

A last (Sunday) night's Athens cable says: The weather on the wedding morning was gloriously fine, "King's weather," the people called it. The King of Greece is probably lucky in the matter of auspicious skies for State occasions. All day long there has been a delicious scent of myrtle throughout the streets of the city, where it has been profusely used in decorations. In fact Athens has been transformed into a city of myrtle. It is a mass of flags and evergreens, with triumphal arches at all the principal street intersections. At an early hour the town was filled with people from the surrounding country, and the national costumes of the peasants added much to the picturesqueness of the scene. At 8 o'clock a salute of five guns was fired, and forthwith bugle calls rang out from all points about the town through the clear morning air as if by magic. The greatest animation was at once apparent in the streets, which, during the next few hours, developed into enthusiasm of the wildest description that Athens has ever witnessed. Along the route to be followed by the bridal procession every inch of vantage ground was taken up. All the stands in the Rue de Stade, Rue d'Ecole, Rue d'Hermis and Place de la Concorde were filled with people. The streets themselves were crowded with people in holiday attire, all anxious to get a sight of the bride. There was continual cheering. All windows affording a view of the procession were occupied, and thousands of people viewed the parade from the roofs of houses. The streets were lined with soldiers.

The royal party left the palace at 11 o'clock. The bride looked very happy, but appeared to be a trifle nervous. Nevertheless she bowed her acknowledgments of the applause of the people, who were all much pleased with her girlish sweetness. For weeks there has been the keenest desire to obtain tickets to witness the wedding ceremony, and those who were lucky enough to get them came early. There was plenty to interest them during the long wait. The first lady to appear in the diplomatic circle was Mme. Vlakos, in a magnificent Greek costume of white, red and gold. Next came Mme. Traubenberg in court costume, with a pink train and white satin front, surmounted by a headdress with a pink band, ornamented with diamond stars, from which depended a gauze vail. They were closely followed by Mme. Olanesko in a sky blue dress, with a gold train; Princess Santzoo, in a costume of red velvet and a grand display of diamonds; Mme. Backmetiew, wearing a Russian costume of orange and gold; Mme. Ojeds, whose dress was admirably set off by a white Spanish mantilla about her head; Baroness Kosjeh in a light-blue dress, trimmed with gold embroidery, Lady Monson in a pretty pink silk costume trimmed with gold.

After a while the ladies of the court appeared, headed by Mme. Theocheri, Mme. Supountzakis and Mme. Anargyro, wearing the national Greek court costume. Their entrance was immediately followed by that of 96 ladies belonging to the suites of the Empress of Germany, the Queen of Italy, Princess of Wales and Empress Frederick, those of the latter being all dressed in sombre colors. Count Herbert Bismarck, in the court dress of a Minister, attracted every eye. Bishops and Archbishops, in their gorgeous satin and gold raiment, stood in a line behind the table, while the Metropolitan of Athens stood in front, supported on each side by a priest, one holding two candles, symbolic of the Father and the Son, and the other three, symbolic of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost.

On the arrival of the royal party at the Cathedral the Metropolitan met them at the door. The company entered the church in the following order: The French Ambassador, accompanied by the Empress of Germany; the Emperor of Germany escorting Empress Frederick; King of Denmark, accompanied by the Queen of Italy; Prince of Wales, accompanied by the Queen of Denmark; Prince Henry of Prussia and Princess of Wales; Czarowitz and Princess of Saxe Mingen. Then followed the Duke of Sparta and Princess Sophia.

The arrangements in the body of the Cathedral were as follows: The centre beneath the dome, which was carpeted with Greek colors, was filled with the royalties, the King and Queen of Greece in the centre, and next them the Emperor and Empress of Germany, ex Empress Frederick, the Prince and Princess of Wales, and their lords and ladies-in-waiting. On the left side of the centre stood the diplomatic corps and the admirals of the various fleets. On the right centre the generals and high officers of the army and distinguished strangers. In the body of the Cathedral, on the left, the mayors and civic dignitaries from all parts of Greece. On the right envoys from abroad and all parts of Greece.

The Emperor of Germany wore the full dress uniform of the White Hussars, and the Prince of Wales that of the Guards. Prince Albert Victor was dressed in the full uniform of the Hussars. The King of Greece and King of Denmark wore the uniform of Greek cavalry generals.

The bridal dress was made of white satin, with long trails of orange blossoms. The enormous train of brocaded silk was held by three maids of honor. The Empress Frederick wore a grey dress, while all the rest of the royal ladies appeared in white, with their usual ceremonial jewels and decorations.

The ceremony commenced at once, the Empress Frederick leading her daughter to the table and the King of Greece his son. The King gave his hand to Empress Frederick, and they both retired. The ceremony was of the most impressive character, and lasted an hour and a quarter. It was the usual one prescribed by the ritual of the Greek Church, with one exception. Instead of the usual ceremony with crowns of orange blossoms, at the special request of the Queen of Greece, gold crowns, surmounted by a cross, were used. These were held over the head of the bride three times by Prince Henry of Prussia, Prince Edward and Prince George of Wales, and over the head of the bridegroom by the Czarowitz and Princess George and Nicholas of Greece. This ceremony was again repeated when the bride and groom had walked round the table three times.

The moment the young couple were united a magnificent burst of red light poured through the colored windows of the cathedral, suffusing the bride and groom, and producing a marvellous effect upon the brilliant uniforms and beautiful dresses. The ceremony being completed, Princess Sophie kissed three times the King of Greece, the Queen of Greece, Empress Frederick, the Empress of Germany and the Queen of Italy. She then kissed once each the Prince of Wales, the Princess of Wales and the young princesses. The Emperor of Germany kissed his mother heartily three times.

The crowns used were those with which the King and Queen of Greece were married. The party returned to the Palace in the same order in which they came.

After the ceremony the newly married couple gave a breakfast in their new home.

In the afternoon the Duke of Sparta and the Princess Sophie drove through the city in an open barouche amid the greatest enthusiasm.

To-night the whole city was illuminated, and the entire population and many visitors paraded the streets cheering and shouting. At a late hour this evening the illuminations were spoiled by a violent gale of wind.

Had More at Home.

Lord Lonsdale was said to have more daughters than any other member of the British aristocracy. At one time he was at a German watering place and took a walk in company with his six oldest daughters. Some Germans, a little behind him, gazed at the procession, and presently one of them remarked in an undertone: "Alas, poor man." Lord Lonsdale caught the words and turned immediately. "Oh, no, sir; not so poor as you think. I have six other daughters at home."—Youths' Companion.

Customs Decisions.

The following decisions were rendered by the Board of Customs during September and October:

Condensed milk, sweetened, a cent and a quarter per lb. and 35 per cent.
Condensed milk, unsweetened, 20 per cent.
Murray's fluid magnesia, 50 per cent.
Fusil oil, $1.90 per imperial gallon.
Ground turmeric, 20 per cent.
Sulphate of Sodium, 20 per cent.
Jellyine, a preparation of corn starch, sugar, etc., a cent and a quarter per lb. and 35 per cent.

An Unconscious Catapaw.

Brown—I always make it a rule to conceal nothing from my wife; I tell her everything.

Jones—Yes, and I can't say that I like you for it.

Brown—How so? Why not?

Jones—Why, your wife tells everything you tell her to my wife, and my wife rakes me over the coals for it.

The Commercial Instinct.

What a Fool (admiringly to Jessamine)—I wish I had your teeth. Why, I'd give $250 for them.

Small Brother (in a stage whisper)—Sell 'em to 'im, sis!

A MARTYR FOR SEVENTEEN YEARS.

How Anthony Comstock is Persecuted for Righteousness Sake.

Anthony Comstock, of New York, last evening told how he had become a veritable martyr to the cause of suppression of vice. He spoke in the Delaware Avenue Baptist Church before an audience that, on account of the rain, was not large.

"No man in the country is more hated and despised by a certain class than I am," Mr. Comstock said, "yet I would not change places with any one in the whole world. Seventeen years ago I gave up my business as a merchant, which was large and flourishing, and abandoned my hope of being rich, to give myself to this work of saving the youth and purifying the morals of the people. The conspiracies and plots to take my life, to rob me of my honor and good name, and to impeach my veracity, I regard as nothing. Whether they be continued or not they shall not swerve me from my God-given task.

"I have been brought to death's door by assassins who have tracked me and sought to take my life. My blood has been shed for the cause; for weeks and weeks I lay sick from an injury inflicted by an assassin, who succeeded in severing four arteries in my face. Smallpox scabs have come by letter to my house, infernal machines have been sent to my office, and many other ways have been taken to injure me in body and to rob me of my good name, yet I thank God that He commissioned me to do this work, and that we have accomplished so much good already."

Mr. Comstock stated that during his 17 years' service as an officer of the State and a representative of the Society for the Suppression of Vice he had seized and destroyed the plates of 208 immoral books and demolished 5,000 negatives. He intended to increase that number before he went home, as he had some work to do in Buffalo and immediate vicinity. He would purify the local atmosphere of some of its death-dealing influences before he returned to New York. Mr. Comstock stated that some of the books seized when he first went into office had been published for 40 or 50 years. Some of them were so vile that he would not show them to the venerable brother who sat there before him were he and the speaker alone together. Mr. Comstock warned the parents that contaminating influences could come to their children right in their own homes through the mails. He advised parents to enter their children's rooms periodically and search their pockets for the death-dealing secret causes that lead them to ruin. The speaker asserted that he had traced the ruin of many a bright lad to dime novels and boys' story papers. He wanted these kept out of the hands of the youth. "They have sealed the ears of many a loving boy and girl against the entrance of the word preached from the sacred desk." Mr. Comstock did not want the children to see daily papers that published "sickening details of loathsome crimes, scandals and sensations, and he declared against Sunday papers, which, he said, give up almost all their space to matter of this kind.—Buffalo Courier.

A Desperate Man.

Bagley had called on fifteen landlords, all of whom objected to leasing him their houses because he had children. At last he became desperate and resolved to have a house at any cost.

"Well," he said to landlord No. 16, "I guess I'll take this place."

"Pardon me, sir," said the landlord, "but have you any children?"

"Yes," sighed Bagley, "but I'll kill them."

Had No Husband.

New York Man (to an acquaintance)—I understand that your daughter is married.

"Yes."

"Do well?"

"Oh, yes; surpassed her mother's fondest dreams."

"I am pleased to hear it. (After a short silence) So she has a good husband, eh?"

"Oh, she has no husband at all. She married an Italian Prince."

Less Litigation Than Usual.

The actions entered on trial in the higher courts are nowadays much diminished in number, owing, no doubt, to the wholesome changes made in the administration of justice by the Ontario Judicature Act. By the provisions of this Act, legal business has been much decentralized, and many cases of a character which were required heretofore to be entered for trial are now disposed of by local officers.

Prudence Followed Reflection.

Mrs. H., mistaking a mirror for a door and suddenly starting back.

Mr. H. (laughingly)—Why don't you through, my dear?

Mrs. H.—Upon reflection, I thought would better not.

Poor Fellow.

"My hands are awfully cold," said the pretty girl suggestively on the last quarter of a starlit sleigh ride.

"Why didn't you bring a muff with you?" asked the practical young man prosaically.

"I did?" she snapped, but she wouldn't explain where the muff had gone to, and he has been wondering ever since just what she meant.

Asking Too Many Questions.

At a foreign railway station—"Guard, can I smoke in this carriage?"

"No; it is against the rules."

"Then where do all these cigar ends on the floor come from?"

"From smokers who have not asked permission."

The New York conference of Christian Endeavor societies at Saratoga, reports 600 societies, with 80,000 members. The united societies of all the states number 7,692 with an aggregate membership of 485,000. In 1881 there were only two societies, with sixty eight members.

NORTHWEST NOTES.

Robert Gerrie, the proprietor of the Grand Union hotel, in evicting a man from his place was assulted, and received injuries which may lose him the sight of his right eye.

Charles Beelsen and John Hubbard were indicted for having in their possession in Canada a chestnut mare and a bay horse which they had stolen from Wm. McCarthy, in Ramsay County, Dakota, and brought them into Canada. The prisoners had been confined in jail on the other side of the boundary line for horse-stealing, but they broke jail and escaped to Canada, stealing the horses in question on their way here. They were captured in the neighborhood of Crystal City by the deputy sheriff and his bailiff, assisted by the Mounted Police and some farmers, and were brought into Winnipeg. They both pleaded guilty and were sentenced to two years' imprisonment.

At Fort Saskatchewan, Constable Graham, of the police force, while handling a revolver, accidentally shot Constable Mansfield, who was standing near, in the thigh. Fatal results are not expected.

Mr. Costigan, Deputy Collector of Inland Revenue, has returned from Calgary, where he was looking into the recent spilling of 7,400 gallons of whiskey, shipped in beer barrels by a well-known city grocery firm, with a view of defrauding the department. Mr. Costigan says the matter is not yet ended, but Riley, the hotelkeeper, is to be punished.

In Manitoba yesterday the Real Property Act of 1889 went into force, placing the registration of land sales in the hands of three officers, located at Winnipeg, Portage Prairie and Brandon.

Can You Guess It?

Two E's and an I, an R and a P,
Put them together and then you will see
The name of the maker of of "G. M. D."

The letters spell Pierce, of course—Dr. Pierce, of Buffalo. G. M. D. means "Golden Medical Discovery," Dr. Pierce's guaranteed cure for Consumption, if taken in time, and for all bilious derangements, skin, scalp and scrofulous diseases. Have you a hacking cough, lassitude, low spirits, and other kindred symptoms. Take this remedy now, before it is too late. It is guaranteed to benefit or cure, or money paid for it will be returned.

Three Baby Winners.

The judge in the New York Evening World contest for beauty among infants has finally, after heroic efforts, picked out the three prettiest of the lot. The winner of the gold double eagle is 9 months' old August Ricardo Gatti; the winner of the second prize is John Benjamin Harrison Gazzo; the winner of the third is Lillie Foster. Baby Gatti and Baby Gazzo hate women and do not like to be kissed. Little Miss Foster is more naturally constructed. She is fond of gentlemen and shows already symptoms of coquetry. But the little boys will probably improve. They often change their views about kissing.

Dr. Pierce's Pellets cure constipation, biliousness, sick headache, bilious headache, and all derangements of the stomach, liver and bowels. One a dose.

Generous-Hearted Skimpy.

"Mr. Skimpy," said the Chairman of the Committee, "a number of gentlemen have subscribed five hundred apiece for the World's Fair Fund. Can we count on you for aid?"

"Why, certainly. When you get your Fair going I shall be very glad to buy a couple of tickets. Don't forget it, gentlemen."

$500, or a Cure.

For many years the manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, who are thoroughly responsible financially, as any one can easily ascertain by enquiry, have offered, through nearly every newspaper in the land, a standing reward of $500 for a case of chronic nasal catarrh, no matter how bad, or of how long standing, which they cannot cure. The Remedy is mild, soothing, cleansing, antiseptic, and healing. Sold by all druggists, at 50 cents.

A Vessel All the Same.

An old salt had just heard of the death of a captain under whom he had made many voyages.

"And what did he die of?" asked the old salt.

"Of the rupture of a vessel."

"And the right kind of death for a sailor, I tell you—at the post of duty," commented the old salt with much emphasis.

No Mere Phrase.

Everard Uppman—You shall have it promptly next Saturday. Mr. Scadds! I give you my word of honor!

Tom Scadds—All right! Drop it into this phonograph here!

All He Could Promise.

Dunn—When can you settle this account Mr. Short?

Short—Oh, come around next week.

"Will you pay me then?"

"I can't promise that exactly; but I can tell you then when to come again."

The budget was presented in the Swiss National Council to-day. Among the expenditures is an item of 9,000,000f. for renewing the rifles of the army.

THE BALTIC CASE.

This case, which has attracted such universal attention, was tried in Owen Sound last week. The prisoners, Trip, Russell, McFadyen, Daggert, Backhause and Peilch were all found guilty of assault, and sentenced. the two first to one year in the Central Prison with hard labor, and all the others to six months in the same institution. The judge promised to look into the matter of intimidation of witnesses as reported of the captain by Constable Pearce. The sentence of this crew is looked upon as exceedingly light, but however light it may be it will have the effect of dettering others from indulging in criminal sport at the expense of a fellow man, or from constituting themselves a tribunal to mete out justice for fancied or real misdemeanors. We venture to state that in all, or nearly all of of the cases, the prisoners have had a lesson ground into them which they will remember equally as well as if their sentences had been five years each.

The bands of justice are tightening slowly but surely around the Cronin suspects in Chicago, and it is altogether probable that that city will again been treated, some of these days, to a hanging tournament which will put the Haymarket executions into the shade.

GRIP'S COMIC ALMANAC.—There are few people in Canada who do not see this entertaining annual. It has just made its appearance for the eleventh year; and in many respects the new book is ahead of any predecessor. The illustrations are abundant; and all of the contents are of a very amusing character. A new feature is the calendar of "Remarkable Events," which runs through the year, and which, alone, is worth far more than the price. In this department it is certainly entertaining and helpful to be told the day and year when pancakes were invented, when the half-holiday agitation was started, or washing-day, instituted, or stolen sermons first used, or Frank Smith was ruined by the street railway (Jan. 15, 2006), or mother-in-law joke invented, or Chicago morally reformed A. D. 5000), or boot-jacks first used as a cat cure, or the streets of Toronto finally fixed or Friday discovered to be an unlucky day,—information on all of which, as illustrations may be found in the January calendar. And the other months are quite as communicative. This book contains 32 pages, and sells at all bookstores at the old price, 10 cents; or, send to publishers, Toronto, and receive the book post-paid by return mail.

FAITHFUL UNTO DEATH.

An Origiual Story of Great Local Interest.

The vast majority of men who become drunkards die drunkards. There have been exceptions—exertion of strong will power put into operation by some extraordinary circumstance which reveals to the victim the depth of his degradation and brings to life a sentiment which can no longer tolerate the fallen state into which he has been cast. The following story is a case in point. It shows how even a dumb animal may be instrumental in arousing the remorse and repentance necessary to a complete escape from the demon of drink. The names which we give are fictitious. Otherwise the story is a true one.

Joseph Goodwin, a farmer, lived some twenty-five or thirty years ago not many miles from Flesherton. He was one of the most intelligent men in that neighborhood, of keen perception, and possessed a mind of more than ordinary strength, and this latter quality was the cause of innumerable quarrels and "scrapes" when Joe was under the influence of liquor; which, too, was pretty often. In fact he had become what would be recognized to-day as an habitual drunkard. Joe had naturally a kind heart, and was admitedly a "fust rate nabur if he'd let licker alone." But it was poor Joe's misfortunate that he coud not let the "licker" alone. Wife and child might suffer and pray, weep and die of hunger, but the unnatural craving must be satisfied.

Joe had one constant companion in whatever he did and wherever he went. That companion was a big, intelligent, Newfoundland dog, who appeared to know that his master on certain occasions required his watchful care. The master, too, was well aware of this sad fact, and bestowed more affection upon his dumb dog Watch, than upon the poor, longsuffering wife in the little log "shanty" at home.

Farmer Breese, a neighbor of Joe Goodwin's, had a barn raising. Joe and his dog were present on that occasion to assist at the raising, and the former considered that as this was the first frame barn put together in his locality, it was a proper and fitting occasion to "jubilate," and accordingly filled up on the whisky (an indispensible article in those days) which was offered to the men as an incentive to work. To be sure Joe himself was not much of an assistant; in fact he was a hindrance, and was alternately laughed at and sternly requested to keep out of the way while others worked. Watch kept at his master's heels all the day, and received more than one kick for his pains. What brute nature is it commingled with our human nature which causes us to maltreat our well-meaning and truest friend, the dog? He is really the only product of nature which fully manifests the spirit of the Bible maxim, "If thy brother smite thee," etc., for he will turn and lick the hand that smites.

All had gone well until the last bent was being raised into position. It was just nearing the perpendicular, when something gave way. One, two pike poles broke, and the others could not sustain the heavy weight. There was a loud cry and every man jumped for his life. Where was Joe? when the cry was given to run, he was standing directly under where the bent would fall, half dazed with liquor and unable to run if he had wished to. When the men returned to seek his whereabouts they found him lying prone upon the ground, stunned, but uninjured. Not so with poor Watch. He was pinned to the earth with the heavy timber, broken, mangled, moaning piteously. He had jumped upon his master when the shout of alarm was given, knocking him down, but out of harm's way, and had himself been crushed into a helpless mass. When Joe Goodwin was brought to his senses a minute afterwards, and saw the guardian of his life lying mangled at his feet, the whole import of the awful tragedy rushed upon him and he cried like a little child. Stooping down to stroke the curly, dying head, he received the last act of devotion from his dumb martyr, who, even amid his moaning, turned and licked the hand of his master. In a few minutes thereafter a life went out which, for noble devotion, has never been excelled by any of God's creation. That was the great awakening in Joe Goodwin's life, and since then no drop of liquor has ever passed his lips. He has informed me personally that many times has the desire for strong drink come upon him with terrible strength, but the up-turned affectionate eyes of that suffering animal always came between him and the glass, and proved the great strength which enabled him to resist. Somewhere on the old farm, in a shady nook, a weather beaten piece of board still records the fact that

Here lie the remains of Watch.
He saved his master's life and soul
And then died. His work was done.
He was faithful
unto death.

The lesson taught to his master by that noble brute bore fruit an hundred fold, and more especially in the home circle. A happy family was that of Joe Goodwin for many years; in fact the old couple are still as happy as the exigencies of life will allow them to be, with married sons and daughters, all prosperous and enenjoying the good things of the world. This story would be rather incomplete did we not inform our readers that Joe Goodwin is a resident of our own little village. Perhaps some of you have heard the story from his own lips. If so we trust that to such it will have lost none of its original charms by being retold in this public form.

Kimberley.

From our own Correspondent.

The sportsmen of this vicinity had a shooting match on the 7th inst. The captains chosen were E. Rear and E. Baker. Volley after volley was heard throughout the day, but as evening drew near the village rung with the noise of many guns. The match was keenly contested throughout, but Rear's men gained the day, notwithstanding that Baker had two men the most. The score stood, Rear 3125, Baker 2880.

The wedding bells are still ringing around here. Mr. Thomas Hawkins and Miss Rebecca Ward of this place were united in the bands of matrimony on Wednesday of last week. Your cor. tenders them the best wishes for a happy future.

Mr. A. Williams and Miss Mary Baker, of Stayner, who has been visiting for some time in our village, returned on Friday last, accompanied by Mr. F. Thurston.

We are informed that a certain man who was living on the third line a couple of miles from here, left the vicinity between two days last week. There will be some mourners.

Mr. B. McKenzie has his new house almost completed, on the outside. It is a credit to the place, and we hope some more will follow suit.

Messrs. Inkster and Osborn have cleaned out the eighth line with their new thresher, and are now going to McIntyre settlement.

The Presbyterian manse, Maxwell, has received a thorough overhauling from top to bottom at a cost of three hundred dollars, which gives it quite an imposing appearance. A new stable has also been built. Quite a number of new roofs have been put on in different parts of the town, ready for winter.

Singhampton.

From our own Correspondent.

Wm. Pearson's woollen mills were destroyed by fire on Oct. 26. The fire is supposed to have caught in the dye room. Part of the stock was saved, but nothing could be done to save the building or machinery. Mr. Pearson's loss is $8,200; insured for $1,000. A large amount of wool, cloth and blankets were burned. The fire was a very hot one on account of the amount of oil consumed, and the illumination was plainly seen for a distance of fourteen miles.

Several sheep having been killed in this vicinity, some enterprising individuals set out poison, and since that time several dogs have turned their toes towards the blue ethereal skies It is to be hoped many others will dit-toe.

Miss Taylor has been engaged as head teacher for our public school. The present teacher, Mr. J.A. Brett, goes to Feversham.

From our own Correspondent.

Everybody seems to enjoy the fine weather we have had of late.

Since our last writing another wedding took place here. Mr. Jos. McDonald, head miller in McGowan's roller mill, and Miss Mary Henry, of the North Line, were married in St. Jerome's Church by Rev. Father Feeny, on 23rd Oct. We wish the young couple success.

The accident which happened to Mrs. J. McArthur on Hallowe'en, it is said, was caused by one of the boys throwing a stone at a dog.

Mrs. Kelley, mother of Mr. Stephen Kelley, of Irish Lake, was buried at the R. C. cemetery on the 30th.

Thanksgiving services were held in the Presbyterian church on Thursday last.

Some few days ago a number of boys, some of them living on front street, caught a few of their neighbors' cats and tied them with long cords and tortured some of them to death, and others were found next day still living. This is not the first time that cats and other dumb animals have been tortured in a shameful manner. The names of the offenders are all booked, and if this heathenish cruelty is attempted again the full vigor of the law will be applied.

Nearly 3 tons of hides were shipped from Durham to the tannery here last week.

Characteristics of the Past Week Carefully Culled for the Curious.

At least one family in this vicinity appreciates The Advance. No less than six brothers are subscribers, and all, with the exception of one, live within a radius of ten miles from Flesherton.

At the cattle fair on Monday there were quite a large number of cattle offered, but all were of very poor quality. Good fat cattle are a very scarce article in Artemesia just at present.

Bro. Fawcett, of the Streetsville Review, has had his veracity shaken. Sorry to hear it. We always believed A. R's veracity was unshakeable.

Hunters were plentiful but game scarce on Thanksgiving Day. Ten mighty huntsmen met at Cullen's lake about 2 p.m. and compared notes, when it was found that the whole crowd had only bagged one rabbit.

Quite a corpulent crowd visited the village on Monday, fair day. The most exciting event was a trotting match between horses belonging to Mr. Halleck Blue, of Collingwood, and James Best, Esq. Mr. Best came out Worst.

Why will you cough when Shiloh's cure will give immediate relief. Price 10 cts., 50 cts., and $1. For sale at the Medical Hall.

Prof. Loisette's Memory system is creating greater interest than ever in all parts of the country, and persons wishing to improve their memory should send for his prospectus free as advertised in another column.

Auction sale of valuable farm stock and implements, on lot 32, con. 7, township of Artemesia, on Tuesday, Nov. 26th, commencing 1 p.m. Twelve month's credit on approved joint notes, or 8 per cent. discount for cash. R. J. Sproule, auctioneer, Richard Pedlar, proprietor.

Quarterly services were held in the church on Sunday last. On Monday afternoon the business meeting of the church showed finances to be in a prosperous condition. The only change made was the appointment of Mr. D. McMullen as steward in place of Mr. John Whitten, who had resigned.

Miss Zillah Trimble, daughter of Mr. W. Trimble, who has been residing with her grandparents on Manitoulin Island for the past year and a half, returned home last week. Miss Baskerville, her aunt, accompanied her home and will spend some time in Flesherton.

George W. LeGard—formerly a typo in the Flesherton Advance office and latterly of Dudley & Burns—has secured a good position on the Exeter Times. George is a bright, intelligent, and energetic young man, who will one day make his mark in the calling he has elected to pursue.—[Streetsville Review.

Money is scarce, and most loan companies have advanced their rate of interest to 7 per cent on real estate mortgages. S. Damude has a large amount to invest at 6½ per cent., and will be pleased to receive applications. Persons wanting to negotiate new loans or renew, will do well to call before the rate advances higher.

A gentleman without legs visited town on Tuesday, and interviewed our citizens generally. Whether he added much to his bank account or not The Advance did not learn. By the way these birds of passage are not as nearly extinct as the pigeon, judging by the number which have swooped down upon us during the past year.

Shiloh's Cure will immediately relieve croup, whooping cough and bronchitis. For sale at the Medical Hall.

A Pleasing Event.

An unusually interesting matter will be disposed of in the Methodist Church at Kimberley on Wednesday, Nov. 20, at 6 o'clock p.m., when Mr. Henry Ellis and Miss Margart Lawrence, and Mr. William H. Stuart and Miss Elizabeth A. Ellis, all of Kimberley, will be united in marriage by the Rev. J.H. Watts. The parties interested are all old school mates of ye editor, and he sends the happy couples his heartiest congratulations. We understand that the doors will be open to friends of the contracting parties.

Returned.

Wm. Strain, Esq., wife and daughter, returned from Northern Dakota on Friday last. Mr. Strain was not at all highly impressed with Dakota's posibilities. He does not believe it to be a good agricultural country. Mr. S. also visited portions of Manitoba, and has the same story to tell of it. What with hail, frosts and drouth, he considers that Northern Dakota and Manitoba labor under the greatest of difficulties so far as grain raising is concerned. There is also as much or more poverty exhibited there than in any portion of Ontario, and this season many farmers will require to receive government aid. This is somewhat different to the glowing tales we are won't to listen to, and throws a little additional light on the subject which appears to have been carefully suppressed. We are sorry to learn that the trip did not benefit Mr. Strain's health to the extent hoped for.

Four Good Jokes.

A young man from this village attended a raffle about six miles from Flesherton one night recently. He started to walk home, and undertook to carry a live goose with him under his arm. In going down a hill he stumbled and fell and lost his goose. When he struck the gravel road, instead of turning westward he travelled towards the east, and after a long tramp reached Maxwell. When that young man discovered his whereabouts he talked out loud till the the air was blue around him, yanked off his boots, turned around and made a bee line for Flesherton in his sock feet and arrived home some time during the night. His socks are now for sale.

JOKE NO. 2.

A young lady, well known in Flesherton, walked into J.G Russell's jewelry store a couple of weeks ago with the object of getting repairs made to some jewelry. During the course of her visit she had occasion to admire a pair of elegant and costly earrings, and remarked jocularly that Mr. Russell should make her a present of them when she got married. As J.G. did not imagine that there was any immediate prospect of such an occurence he readily gave his consent. Imagine Mr. Russell's surprise when the earrings were claimed last week, just one week from the day he had promised them. An ordinary, weak little summer zephy could have knocked him over. Like a little gentleman, however, J.G. "penied up" and now laughs at the joke as heartily as anybody.

JOKE NO. 3.

On the evening of Thanksgiving Day a large number of turkeys were placed on a certain resident's verandah, while being packed in boxes for shipment. The owner was doing the packing. Several young men decided that it would be a nice thing to secure one of those turkeys without paying for it, and accordingly laid their plans, which proved highly successful. Two of them entered the house, and while one engaged the owner of the turkeys in conversation the other stepped out upon the verandah "to spit" and quickly hoisted a big gobbler over the railing to confederates below. As the owner of the turkeys left with them on the following morning it is not known whether he has yet missed anything. A reporter of The Advance viewed the whole operation from across the street.

JOKE NO. 4.

The fourth and last joke kicked the wrong way. Some young men were returning from a shoot on Thanksgiving Day, and came across some ducks belonging to Mr. Ward Harrison. One of the crowd fired into the flock and keeled two of them over. Mr. Harrison discovered the guilty party and made him whack up two dollars for his fun.

Division Court.

Judge Lane held Division Court in the Town Hall, Flesherton, on Thursday last. Following we give a list of the most important cases which were tried, with the result :

The old timber difficulties were still on, there being five cases of garnishee for wages for getting out timber. The garnishees were discharged.

Sullivan v. Wolseley, A. Traynor garnishee, action for wages. Verdict for plaintiff.

Hoy v. Hoffman, action in replevin, adjourned on payment of costs within ten days, otherwise judgement.

Companion Pictures.

Another handsome reminder of the continued enterprise of The Youth's Companion, the favorite family paper, has come to us in the form of a Colored Announcement Card, printed in fourteen colors. It is folded in the centre, and has on either cover companion pictures. Spring is represented by a beautiful maiden who is returning through the fields, her hands filled with trailing arbutus—that delicate spring flower which growes so plentifully in many localities. On the companion page, the farmer's daughter is pictured coming through the harvested grain, carrying a well-filled pitcher and basket. The bearer of the noon-day lunch is a welcome sight to the hungry reapers. The interior of the card contains an array of authors and articles for the coming volume unsurpassed by any paper. This beautiful Card is only an indication of the great enterprise of The Companion which has made it a National Family Paper, with more than 430,000 subscribers. Nowhere can there be obtained so much entertainment and instruction for so little money (only $1.75 a year). If you subscribe now you will receive the paper free to Jan. 1. 1890, and for a full year from that date. The publishers offer to send specimen copies and this colored announcement card free. THE CRONIN TRIAL.

Witnesses From the Inner Circle of the Clan-na-Gael.

CLOSING IN THE NET.

Cronin Was Suspected of Being a Spy—The Jury Carefully Guarded.

A Chicago despatch of Wednesday says: At the opening of the court in the Cronin trial this morning State's Attorney Longenecker asked for an attachment for Edward Spellman, of Peoria, the district officer of the Clan-na-Gael. Mr. Longenecker said Spellman had been served with a subpœna, and had agreed to come when called for. Two telegrams has been sent to him, but he had not responded. The attachment was issued.

A VERY SECRET TRIANGLE.

The first witness was Dennis O'Connor. He testified that he was a member of Camp 20, Clan-na-Gael. At a meeting of the camp on Feb. 8th the witness said he heard Thomas O'Connor state that he had heard read in Dr. Cronin's camp the minority report of the committee to try the executive body of the order. The names of the members of the executive body were not mentioned, and witness said he never knew who composed the triangle. Then it was voted to appoint a committee to go up to Dr. Cronin's camp and investigate the matter of the minority report which Dr. Cronin had read.

THE CAMP RECORD BOOK.

Patrick Nolan, Financial Secretary of Camp 20, produced his record book, and from it testified as to the numbers borne by Coughlin, Cooney, O'Sullivan, Beggs and Burke. Witness further testified that he was present at a meeting of the camp on the night of May 3rd, the day preceding Dr. Cronin's death; that Beggs presided; that there was a call for the report of the Secret Committee appointed February 8th, and that Beggs replied that the committee was to report to him alone. Witness said that on the Sunday following Dr. Cronin's disappearance he met Burke and Cooney about 3 o'clock in the afternoon in a saloon. This was before witness knew of Cronin's disappearance. They went to another saloon and played cards for a couple of hours.

AN ORGANIZATION "RUN BY ROGUES."

The next witness was Captain Thomas F. O'Connor, who created excitement in Camp 20 on the night of February 8th by saying he had heard read in Dr. Cronin's camp a report of the committee that tired the triangle. Captain O'Connor said Andrew Foy was the first man to speak. Foy arose in his place in the camp and addressed the Senior Guardian, and stated that he arose under a terrible strain, that after the disclosures of Le Caron in London the organization, as an organization, was no more. That there were four British spies in the organization, and that it should be reorganized, and every one that was in the organization who had the slightest taint or suspicion attached to him should be expelled, "I," continued the witness, "arose and stated that I was not surprised at hearing the gentleman talk as he had done; that I knew by positive information that the organization was run by a parcel of rogues known as our executive body; that they had squandered our funds even to the extent of $100,000, and not alone that, but they had sent our best men across to England to have them put behind the bars. I stated positively that Le Caron was an agent of our executive body and received pay from them. At the moment I was interrupted by three brothers with a demand to tell where I got my information. I did not like the first brother who spoke to me, and I said, 'You demand nothing,' when there were two or three other brothers who joined in the demand and there was a general uproar, so I turned around to the Senior Guardian and I said to him, 'If the Senior Guardian demands of me where I got my information I will tell him.' He did not say anything. Then there was more uproar. I turned a second time and a third time, and said if the Senior Guardian would demand where I got my information I would tell him. Then I stated I had heard a terrible report of the trial committee in Buffalo, and that I had also seen a written report, 800 pages of closely written long hand, about the trial, and that I was positive of my statement. At that instant Dan Coughlin, member of the camp, arose and said, 'Mr. Guardian, I move you that a secret committee of three be appointed to find out the source of Captain O'Connor's information.' These were his words. Then there was some one else on his feet, and the Senior Guardian rapped the camp to order, as it was such a tumultuous time, such turmoil, and somebody spoke, and he said, 'I will hear no more of this subject, and I will appoint a committee.'"

"Who was the Senior Guardian at this time?"

"John F. Beggs."

THE TRIAL COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

On cross-examination Captain O'Connor said he did not say in his speech of February 8th that Cronin read the report of the trial of the triangle, nor did he say in what camp it was read. He said that after he was subpœnaed to appear before the coroner's jury he met Beggs, and asked him if he should disclose the secrets of the organization. Beggs told him to go ahead, as they were already public property. The witness said he had heard of the "Inner circle" as applied to the executive body, but never in connection with individual camps. O'Connor said he had been at work on the Cronin case without pay up to September 26th, when he was appointed a policeman.

On re-direct examination it was brought out that there were five or six members of Camp 20 present when the witness made his speech on February 8th who were in the other camp when the report regarding the triangle trial was given, and were therefore cognizant of the facts as to the camp in which it was given and who gave it. He explained it was a verbal, not a written report. There were eighteen or twenty members of Camp 20 in the other camp when the report was made. That report, said he, was made by the late Dr. Cronin, in Cronin's camp. Subsequently Cronin showed the witness the written report.

The next witness, Henry Owen O'Connor, a member of Camp 20, described the proceedings at the meetings of February 8th and 22nd without bringing out any new points. At a subsequent meeting, however, he said Dan Coughlin came to him and said information had been received in Chicago that a confederate of LeCaron was in the organization, and indications pointed to Dr. Cronin as the man. The witness stopped him at that point.

THE TRIANGLE DENOUNCED.

Police Officer John M. Collins testified that he had been a member of Camp 20. He said that at the reunion given by 22, Dick Powers and Pat McGarry made speeches denouncing the triangle. Then Beggs said this tirade against the triangle and Alex. Sullivan must cease or there would be war. That Sullivan had many friends there.

Patrick McGarry, Senior Guardian of the Clan-na-Gael Camp in Lakeview, instituted by Dr. Cronin, and of which Dr. Cronin was a member, was the next witness. He described the reunion meeting on Feb. 22nd, without adding material information, and he told of a visit he made to the house of O'Sullivan on the Sunday following Dr. Cronin's death. He there questioned O'Sullivan very closely about his contract with Dr. Cronin to treat his men in case of accident, and described the twitching of O'Sullivan's moustache.

HOW THE JURY FARE.

The county furnishes the jury with seven rooms and a private dining room. One of the seven apartments is used as a reception room, where the wives of the jurymen occasionally visit them in the evening. Another apartment is used as a smoking room, and still another is used for a general sitting room. In the latter are kept the piano and other musical instruments. There is also considerable gymnastic apparatus, such as dumb-bells, Indian clubs, pulley-weights, etc. Both the gymnasium and piano are furnished by Juror North.

The only papers the men are allowed to read are the New York illustrated weeklies, which are first carefully looked over by the bailiffs, who cut out all the references to the Cronin case. Four times a day the jurymen form in line and march two by two to and from Judge McConnell's court room. This peculiar procession does not fail to draw a crowd, and usually by the time the line reaches its destination it has grown to twice its former size.

PEORIA, Ill., Oct. 31.—Edward Spellman, the prominent distiller and District Delegate of the Clan-na-Gael, who is wanted in Chicago as a witness in the Cronin trial, has disappeared. Nobody seems to know where he is.

The Trial Progressing.

A Chicago despatch says: When the Cronin trial was resumed to-day, counsel for the defence moved to strike out all of that part of Patrick McGarry's evidence given yesterday, in which McGarry described his visit to the house of defendant O'Sullivan after Cronin's murder, and at which time he questioned O'Sullivan about his contract with Cronin. After argument it was decided to postpone a decision on the point till this afternoon, in order to allow counsel time to present authorities.

George Reilly, a barkeeper, was called. He testified that in the latter part of March Coughlin, O'Sullivan and others were in the saloon talking politics when Coughlin said a certain North side Catholic was talking too much, and that if he did not keep his mouth shut he would get the worst of it.

The State's Attorney sought to introduce the correspondence between Beggs and Spellman. Mr. Foster, attorney for Beggs, said he was ready to admit anything that Beggs ever wrote, but that he could say nothing about letters written by any one else. So the matter went over, pending the appearance of Spellman.

W. P. Hatefield, salesman for Revell & Co., told of selling to "J. B. Simonds" the furniture taken to the flat at No. 117 Clark street, and subsequently conveyed to the Carlson cottage. The only new point developed was that Simonds said the furniture was "for temporary use."

THE BLOOD-STAINED TRUNK IN COURT.

The trunk in which Cronin's body was carried away was brought into court. Hatefield testified that it was similar to the one sold to Simonds. On cross-examination he said he could not swear it was the identical trunk, because the firm kept such on hand always, and perhaps other dealers did also. It came out that Mr. Forest, of counsel for the defence, had bought such a trunk from the witness. Witness could not swear positively that the furniture in the Carlston cottage was the same furniture sold to simonds, but he said it was precisely like it.

FORMER ATTACKS ON CRONIN.

After recess the jury was excluded and the matter of striking out McGarry's evidence as to what was said during this visit to O'Sullivan's house on the Sunday following the murder was taken up. The court finally decided to exclude all the talk regarding a former attack on Dr. Cronin. This was not satisfactory to the defence, and another flow of eloquence resulted. Finally the cross-examination of McGarry was resumed.

"Major" John W. Sampson afterwards testified that about two years ago Coughlin tried to hire him to "slug" Dr. Cronin. The witness, on cross-examination, admitted that Coughlin had arrested him three or four times, once for robbery, that he had been convicted of passing counterfeit money, that he was a gambler by profession, but denied that he followed Mr. Blaine through Michigan when he was making speeches last fall, or Governor Hill, or Senator Thurman for the purpose of picking pockets. He said he went to some of these places for the purpose of securing sporting privileges. He naively explained that he was "playing de shells," which is a variation of what is known as three-card monte.

THE AUTHORITIES WERE WATCHING.

William Lynn said he was with Sampson at the time that Coughlin and Sampson had a conversation, the purport of which he did not hear.

Joseph C. O'Keefe, Dr. Cronin's tailor, said he attended a meeting of Camp 20 in September, 1888. After the meeting he had a conversation with Beggs about Cronin and Alexander Sullivan. The witness said: We spoke first in reference to the union of the two rival factions of the Order. Beggs said he did not have much confidence in the new Executive. Then the Trial Committee was discussed, and he said Cronin was not the proper man to put on the committee to try Alexander Sullivan. I said Cronin did not have as unsavory a record as James Rogers, of Brooklyn, another one of the Trial Committee. Beggs then said Cronin had admitted Coughlin as a member of Camp 96 without a formal initiation, and had furnished him with passwords. I told him Cronin was too sincere a patriot to do anything of that kind. I said I would ask Cronin in reference to it. Beggs then said Cronin was not a fit man to belong to Irish societies.

On cross-examination it was brought out that Beggs objected to Cronin's being on the committee to try the Triangle because he was an enemy of Alexander Sullivan.

Cornelius Flynn, who was with Beggs and O'Keefe, corroborated O'Keefe's testimony. Several other witnesses gave unimportant testimony and the court adjourned until to-morrow.

An afternoon paper says that soon after the disappearance of Cronin the State put spies upon Camp 20, and a man concealed in the hall during some of its meetings took notes of its proceedings.

Among the visitors in the court-room to-day was Mr. Wm. Glass, of London, Ont., Sheriff of Middlesex county.

A Winnipeg despatch of Thursday says: George Baker, Assistant State's Attorney, of Chicago, drove out to Stony Mountain to-day, accompanied by Mr. H. M Howell, and had a talk with Gillette, the imprisoned forger. Gillette gave a detailed account of Burke's confession to him and other prisoners. There were some new points of interest. Gillette said that Burke continually insisted on making confidants of him and the other prisoners, and often cried like a child over the murder. He told how Dr. Cronin was lured to the Carlson cottage and slugged, and repeated the story wired yesterday. Cronin was attacked while entering the cottage, and made a greater fight than his assailants expected.

It has been ascertained from other sources that Burke had a narrow escape from assassination at the hands of the Clan-na-Gael before his arrest in Winnipeg. A letter has been found which was posted at East Selkirk shortly after the murder, referring to Burke, in which the writer said he would carry out the instructions of the order, but insisted on having his own way and time, if he was to succeed in getting rid of Burke. This shows that Burke was to have been assassinated while travelling to Liverpool. Burke had a couple of Fenian friends in Winnipeg, who secreted a mysterious tin box for him. This contained Cronin's clothes, which were of the finest make. There is no doubt, from Gillette's statements, that the contradictions as to the disposal of Cronin's body after the murder are easily explainable.

Mr. Baker had an interview with Heffer yesterday afternoon, but he is pretty well convinced that this man knows nothing but what he has picked up on the street or from persons who visited him while in jail. Gillett is the only man who is at all likely to tell a story which would go down with a jury, but Mr. Baker is very much afraid that his removal from the penitentiary to a Chicago witness box would be a difficult matter. Baker hopes to get away to-morrow morning.

Germany Must Sleep in Armor.

A Berlin cable of Wednesday says: During the debate on the budget in the Reichstag to-day Herr Vernors refuted a statement made by Herr Bebel, the Socialist leader, that Russia is Germany's hereditary foe. The Sovereigns, he said, are united in desiring peace, and he hoped their efforts to maintain it would be successful.

Herr Von Bennigsen said Germany's position in Europe compelled her to wear heavy armor, and she would stake everything to enable her to wage a possible war victoriously. He favored the appointment of an Imperial Minister of Finance with undivided responsibility.

Dr. Windthorst indicated the willingness of the Centre party to grant money for defences if necessary. It is rumored the Centreists will introduce a motion providing for the exemption from military service of candidates for the ministry of all denominations up to the age of 26, and for the total exemption of ordained ministers.

A "Jerry" Building Collapses.

A Paterson, N.J., despatch says: A large new three story brick dwelling, nearly completed, and owned by Charles C. Farmer, fell at Passaic City to-day with a terrific crash, burying sixteen workmen. Everyone about the place was more or less injured. The workmen were dug out of the debris by hundreds of rescuers, and carried to a near-by cottage, which was temporarily converted into a hospital. Three are not expected to recover. The scene around the improvised hospital is pitiful. The owner of the building is severely condemned, as it was a Budensiek affair.

Serious Results of the Bomb Explosion.

A Franklin, Pa., despatch says: The bomb explosion at the Galloway schoolhouse on Friday, by which so many school children were injured, is having more serious results than expected. The explosion was the result of criminal carelessness on the part of two young men, who filled a gas pipe with giant powder and allowed the children to play with it. Over thirty children were in close proximity. Eighteen were injured. Seven are in a critical condition, and it is thought four will die. The men are under arrest.

A Young Murderer.

A Plymouth, Mass., despatch of Thursday says: The Grand Jury to-day found a bill against Joseph Debarros, of New Bedford, for manslaughter. Debarros, is the 8-year-old Portuguese boy who last September was charged with causing the death of a playmate in a cranberry bog in Plymouth by stabbing him with a jack-knife. He was tried in the district court and discharged. It is not known whether the boy is in this country now or not.

The body of Balloonist Walrath, who was lost in Otsego, lake, N. Y., September 24, was secured Tuesday afternoon twenty feet from where the parachute was found.

BRIDES IN COTTON BAGGING.

An Anti-Jute Double Wedding at the Piedmont Exposition.

An Atlanta, Ga., despatch gives fuller particulars of the double public wedding as follows: Henry W. Grady gave away two brides, giving each a sounding smack upon the lips. Governor Gordon, who was standing near, followed suit, and the crowd yelled itself hoarse. All this occurred at the Piedmont Exposition. It was Alliance day, and the central event was the double marriage of enthusiastic young Alliance men, the bridal party being arrayed in suits of cotton bagging as a symbol of their contempt for the Jute Trust. There was a magnificent pyrotechnic display on the grounds at night. The grounds are almost large enough for a world's fair, but they were covered with people. There are eighty thousand Alliance men in Georgia, and it seemed as if every one was on hand with his family. As Jones, Livingstone, Polk and Gordon spoke there were cries of "Bring on the brides," and when at last the speakers' stand was cleared and the band struck up a wedding march the crowd went wild. The stand was between the grand stand and the race track. At a given signal the two bridal parties came up. Each pair were seated in a carriage draped in cotton bagging and flags, drawn by four white horses, which were covered with the cotton bagging. The two carriages were headed by bands, and at the stand was another. The bridal carriages were followed by others, some of them being the finest private turnouts in Atlanta. Mr. Grady and the directors of the exposition received them at the stand and two eminent divines stood ready to perform the marriage ceremony. Both brides were good looking—one of them particularly so. The grooms were rather plain looking. The gowns of the brides were trimmed with satins and laces until they looked quite well, but the cotton bagging suits of the men were rather "jay." There was nothing particularly distinctive about the ceremonies, except the comment of the crowd. After it was over there were congratulations, and then the show was made particularly interesting by a contest between the cotton bagging cowboys and the jute Indians, the cotton boys winning, of course.

The persons married are Mr. Walker Downs, a Newton county merchant, and Miss Mamie Winburn, of Conyers, and Mr. Henry R. Wells and Miss Alice Whaley, of Gwinnette county. They will be given a reception to-morrow at the grounds, when they will be presented with the gifts which have been sent by all the exhibitors at the exposition and merchants from all over Georgia. Governor Gordon was booked to perform the marriage ceremony. An investigation of the law, however, made by Chief Justice Bleckley, revealed the fact that the Governor had no authority to officiate. In the emergency Rev. Dr. Barnett, pastor of the Central Presbyterian Church, and Rev. C. H. Morrison, pastor of the First Methodist Church, were substituted. A remarkable scene occurred in the city on Whitehall street an hour later. As the bridal procession was returning the proprietor of a leading dry goods house offered them $50 each if they would eat dinner from a table placed in the show window. The proposition was accepted and thousands of people packed the street to watch the strange wedding feast.

A notable incident of the speechmaking was the presentation of a substitute for bagging by President Livingstone, of the Georgia State Alliance. He said: "If we admit for the sake of argument that the fight against jute has been a failure, it has done one thing—it has developed the genius of the South. I hold in my hand a piece of cotton bagging made from common stalk and a piece of rope made from the same stalk. It can be sold for four cents a yard and weighs two pounds to the yard. (Prolonged applause.) The farmer can come to Atlanta, buy a few castings and make the machine at home with which to manufacture this bagging. He can manufacture it in the winter and in wet weather. It will be worth $1,000,000 to the South. When the farmer learns to produce the necessaries of life at home and not send to Illinois and the Northern States for them he will cease to be a hewer of wood and drawer of water. The farmers don't seek to oppress the merchant or manufacturer, but merely to lead them into the channels of legitimate trade."

He closed by saying: "Let the farmers of the South produce what they consume, save money, educate their children, and when the boys and girls grow up to manhood and womanhood marry them in cotton bagging."

How the Burglar Was Fooled.

A Chicago despatch says: A burglar entered the residence of Gen. M. High on Monday night, and, seeing his image in a large mirror, supposed it was another man, and so drew his revolver and blazed away at it. Mr. High and his family were at dinner on the floor below, and were startled by the shooting and the noise of breaking glass. Mr. High grabbed a poker and headed a procession up the stairway, but when the room was reached nothing was found but the broken mirror and an open window.

Progress at Nicaragua.

A San Juan del Sur despatch says: The Nicaragua Government is disposed to found a city to be called America at the Atlantic terminus of the Nicaragua Canal. Engineers have gone to San Juan del Norte to survey the locality and set off building lots.

Great enthusiasm prevails over a new gold field discovered along the banks of the Prince Pulka River, 170 miles from San Juan del Norte. The field covers an area of several square miles.

A TWENTY dollar gold piece is offered by the New York World to the person who will send it the best recipe for keeping a husband at home evenings. The necessity for some such recipe is evident to all. Business, the club, the theatre and the lodge prevent a large number of men from enjoying the society of their wives during the long winter evenings and if the World can find a recipe to remedy this evil and give the lonely wives an opportunity to again become acquainted with their husbands they will confer a lasting favor upon the wives at least.

A LITTLE CHURCH "SCRAP."

A Methodist Parson Yanked Out of a Catholic Pulpit—Mob Law Prevails.

A Topeka, Kan., despatch of Thursday says: Adjutant-General Roberts received a telegram to-day from the Mayor of Axtell asking that militia be sent at once to quell a riot there. General Roberts ordered out Company "G" of the Third Regiment at Marysville, and left on the first train for the scene. Only meagre particulars have been received. Axtell, a town of 700 people, is settled largely by Roman Catholics. On Wednesday a Methodist minister named Johnson, from the eastern part of the State, arrived at Axtell to hold a revival meeting. In the audience were a number of Catholics. The minister assailed the Catholic Church so abusively that a Catholic present called him a liar. He continued his remarks, and four Catholics rushed to the pulpit, and taking the preacher by the collar threw him down. In a moment the pulpit was surrounded by an angry mob, and a general row ensued. Although the Catholics were in the minority they were too much for the Methodists, and succeeded in throwing the preacher and two others out of the house. The whole town was soon aroused. Four Catholics were arrested and put in the city prison. This enraged the Catholic population, and they organized this morning to assist their imprisoned associates. The town of St. Bridget, a few miles distant, is settled entirely by the Catholics, and it is reported the whole town is organizing to go to the rescue of the Axtell Catholics. The Mayor says he is powerless to control the mob and fears a conflict between the two elements.

ATHENS EN FETE.

Emperor William Visits a British Man-of-War and Talks Some.

An Athens cable of Wednesday says: A state ball was given at the palace last night which was attended by 3,000 guests. The Royal and Imperial personages present marched in procession through the ball-room. Emperor William, escorting the Queen of Greece, led the march. They were followed by the King of Greece and the Empress of Germany, the Czarowitz and the Princess of Wales, the Duke of Sparta and the Princess of Saxe-Meiningen, and Prince Henry of Prussia and his sister, Princess Sophie, the bride of the Duke of Sparta. There were only three dances. Emperor William to-day paid a visit to the British fleet in the Pirœus.

Emperor William took luncheon to-day on board the British flagship Dreadnaught. In responding to a toast to his health he expressed his pleasure and pride at being created an Admiral of the fleet by Queen Victoria. From his boyhood, when he rambled in Portsmouth dockyard, he had taken the deepest interest in the fleet. "I congratulate you," he said, "upon the result of my inspection. To-day Nelson's famous signal is no longer necessary. You all do your duty. We, as young naval nations, come to England to learn from the first navy in the world." In concluding he asked for three cheers for the English navy. The German officers heartily responded. Emperor William will start for Constantinople to-morrow afternoon. The British and German fleets will escort him from the Pirœus.

HARDSHIPS OF THE SEA.

Disabled Vessels and Starving Crews Left to Their Fate.

A New York despatch of Monday night says: The Old Dominion steamship Wyanoke, which arrived here from Norfolk to-day, reports that yesterday, off the Delaware Capes, the schooner J. G. Morse, of Portland, Maine, was spoken dismantled and disabled. Her captain said the larger part of his crew had been washed overboard, and his vessel was unable to reach port. The mate had died of exposure. The captain and two sailors were the only ones on board, and they were all sick and scarcely able to work. Captain Humphrey, of the Wyanoke offered to take the schooner in tow, but the schooner's captain declined his offer. He asked that enough men be given him to take his vessel into port. Captain Humphrey was unable to comply with the request. A lifeboat was sent with provisions to the schooner, but the sea was so rough that the attempt to reach her was abandoned and the vessel was left to her fate. Five miles further north the Wyanoke spoke two disabled Italian vessels. The barque Western Belle, from Ivilo, 197 days out, arrived here to-day dismantled. Four of her crew were disabled by injuries received during rough weather.

Courteous Chinese.

Principal Grant says that the Chinese idea of courteous treatment is carried into every walk and phase of life. He would rather travel in a third class car in China or Japan than in a second class here, because there a traveller is never, never annoyed by tobacco chewers, smokers, swearers or other coarse and offensive habits. He was introduced at certain places as the head of a university, with ever so many scholastic degrees attached to him, and thus received a personal application of their reverence for learned men. The profoundest salaams were made to him, the choicest tea was brewed for his refreshment, and he was honored in other ways. He described the tea as something delicious and exhilarating, not at all like what is in use here. Nothing is put in to flavor or modify it. But it is very dear, being worth there $5 a pound.—Kingston Whig.

Room at the Top.

There is always room at the top. Some men drudge along as college presidents on $4,000 or $5,000 a year, but Anthony Hamilton, who was the most successful jockey in the past season, has just accepted an offer to ride for Mr. August Belmont in the coming year for a salary of $10,000, which is as much as Mr. Vanderbilt paid his imported French cook, or as a crack baseball player can make by earnest and conscientious attention to his profession.—Boston Pilot.

Gazzam—I saw the ghost of a cow last night.

Simeral—O nonsense. Cows have nothing of the kind.

"Yes they have. I have often heard of animal spirits."—Time.

DR. TALMAGE'S ENGLISH COUNTERPART.

Singularly Impressive and Winning Pulpit Manners of Dr. Newman Hall.

This tall, broad-shouldered man, who stands in the pulpit of Christ Church, Lambeth, says a London letter to the New Orleans Times, is Newman Hall. To my mind he is as good an actor as there is on the English stage, and an orator who would make himself famous in the Commons in a night. The church is crowded. It is always so. It is a rather imposing-looking structure, to which a great many Americans go, and they are always repaid for their trouble.

Unlike the experience at Spurgeon's or at the City Temple, the visitor is always provided with a seat. There is nothing especially noteworthy about the service or the people who attend it, or the location of the church, to draw visitors over Westminster bridge; but those who like a clear, simple, ringing sermon from the lips of an orator who knows how to use his voice and his arms as well, go there often, and are never disappointed.

It makes little difference what text he selects or what the subject, there is always a vigorous handling of it and a Niagara of thought that will take the average man the remainder of the week to digest.

In manner he recalls Depew. He is quite as graceful, and his words flow as easily as do those from the lips of that charming orator. Now he speaks in an entreating, fatherly way, then when he comes to some important point in his discourse he raises his voice, bends over his pulpit, looks steadily at his people, and shakes his long, bony finger for a minute or two at them and repeats the sentence over and over again. There will be a pause of an instant and then he will jump back a foot or two, draw himself up to his full height and shake the rafters of the church by his denunciations of sin and the devil.

Dr. Hall uses no notes and never refers to his Bible. He has everything at his fingers' ends. There is no hesitation for a word. They flow as freely as a running stream. Twenty-five minutes are consumed by the sermon, and then when he comes to his last prayer he throws himself on his knees, holds his face in his hands and sobs like a child as he pleads for mercy for his people. There is a tear in his eye, and among the audience men and women are using their handkerchiefs freely. His voice rises and falls in agony of grief, and every one within sound of it is moved by his earnestness.

When the prayer is over the organ peals forth, the choir boys sing and the preacher steps forward to deliver his benediction. He raises his hands and holds them in the air as he tells his people that upon the conclusion of the service there will be an outdoor meeting, which all are invited to attend.

Those who wait to see will find the tall figure of the great preacher standing in the midst of three or four hundred men and women in the evening twilight as they are singing and praying. There is a crowd in the streets, and few persons seem to be afraid to venture near enough to hear the service. Those Mr. Hall goes to himself, takes them kindly by the hand, speaks a word or two of encouragement and brings them over to the meeting.

Behold How They Love One Another.

The action of a neighboring Episcopal congregation in reducing the salary offered their minister to $1 per annum, and the tactics adopted by the Anti-Federationists in the Methodist Church, as well as a good deal that takes place in many other quarters may tempt people to ask whether professing Christians can afford to denounce politician in the savage terms in which they are often denounced by many who lay claim to very superior piety. Supposing a lively politician should present the world with a graphic account of all the church quarrels, clerical scandals, cases of discipline, clerical suspensions, depositions and other matters of that kind that have taken place in Canada during the last year!—Canada Presbyterian.

Baltimore Apple Bread.

Make a nice dough for sweet rusks, as they are known in New England, or buns, as they are known elsewhere. When this dough is very light, roll it out into two good-sized cakes about half an inch thick, and spread one with stewed apples, place the other over it, and let it rise for half an hour, then bake it in a good oven. As soon as it is done spread some stewed apples over the top, add plenty of sugar, bits of butter and nutmeg, and set the cake back in the oven for the sugar to form a coating. Serve hot or cold.

Stopped the Clock.

Dentist (to patient)—This laughing gas does't seem to have much effect on you, sir?

Patient—No. I'm a professional humorist.

And the old clock on the wall that had been in the dentist's family for 80 years with never a stop, held its hands before its face as a dull thud announced that a cord had broken and a 10-pound weight had dropped.—Time.

She Got the Facts.

"Oh, I had my fortune told, and Miss Larkins, broke off the engagement."

"Why, is she as superstitious as that?"

"Oh, no; but my fortune was told by Bradstreet, and that settled me."

Doctor—Take these powders as directed, and your cold will be gone in two or three days.

Patient—You seem quite hoarse, doctor?

Doctor—Yes; I've had a bad cold for four weeks.

The Usual Way.

"Shall we sit on the sofa, George darling, or would you rather have the big chair?"

"I'll take an easy chair, my charmer, and you shall have your own kneesy seat, as usual."

How He Kept His Mouth Shut.

"Don't sleep with your mouth open,' said Fred to his younger brother. "You should breathe through your nose."

"But I don't know when my mouth's open. What do you do when you wake up and find your mouth open?"

"What do I do? Why, I get up and shut it."

GOT TWELVE YEARS.

That Was the Sentence Imposed on Harry Spiesz for Murdering Ruby Nelson.

The Buffalo News has the following about a case which created considerable talk in this city at the time: The last act in the Ruby Nelson murder case was seen by many people in the Supreme Court room yesterday morning. Judge Corlett sentenced Harry Spiesz, who escaped with the light verdict of manslaughter, to 12 years' imprisonment. Good behavior will reduce his actual term of penal servitude to 7 2-3 years.

Great desire was manifested by Mr. Hatch, representing Spiesz's family, to have the young man allowed to expiate his crime in the penitentiary of this county, and a law was found which allowed of this being done. C. S. Hatch read affidavits of Dr. Baething, John Spiesz, W. J. Wiegle and Rose Spiesz attesting the prisoner's weak mind.

"John Jacob Henry Spiesz, stand up," said the clerk. The prisoner arose looking pale, but answered in a firm voice that he had no reason to urge why sentence should not be pronounced against him.

"I am 21 years of age," said he in further reply, "and born right here in Buffalo. I am a bartender by occupation."

Judge Corlett then arose and spoke with great solemity and impressiveness.

"You have been tried," he said, "on an indictment for murder by a very intelligent jury who took your case under consideration after much effort by intelligent counsel. They took great pains in debating the case and gave you the benefit of every reasonable doubt; they turned in each instance on the side of mercy. Ordinarily, remarks made to a prisoner after conviction are not productive of much good, and are usually unheeded. Your habits of life have been dissolute and loose and your situation recalls the words of the wise man spoken 3,000 years ago of just such people as you have partially consorted with. 'Remove thy way far from her, come not near to her house; her house is the way of hell leading down to the Chamber of Death.' If you had listened to the supplications of your mother, if you had obeyed the orders of your father, you would not have been here to-day. The affidavits read show that you have contracted a loathsome disease as a consequence of your sin, and it may be that that has much to do with your weakness of intellect. At your time of life, if you are subjected to rigid discipline, if you are truly penitent, it may be that you may yet become an industrious, quiet and sober man. The sentence of the court in your case is that you be confined in the Erie County Penitentiary for the term of 12 years."

A murmur of sympathy ran over the court room, for the sentence was more severe than had been expected.

"By good behavior," concluded the Judge, "four years and four months may be deducted from your sentence."

Then the crowd surged to the door.

There will be no appeal and Spiesz's friends express themselves well satisfied with the results of the trial and with his being allowed to expiate his crime in the penitentiary in his native city, where they can visit him.

Regarding his work he reports that he organized 19 local assemblies in England and Scotland and two in Ireland.

Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor, has issued the call for the fourth annual convention in Boston on the 10th of December. The chief business to be taken up is thus announced: "The St. Louis convention resolved upon a general agitation for the establishment of the eight-hour work day upon May 1st, 1890, and it now becomes the mission of the Boston convention to transform, if in the wisdom of the delegates there assembled it may be deemed advisable, the agitation, which has now become world-wide, into an organized movement for its realization."

What is Your Fighting Weight?

Railway travelling should be charged for on a basis of two cents a mile. Every railway in the country has been assisted by public funds, and railroad fares are the same now as they were twenty-five years ago, namely, arranged on a basis of three cents a mile. There are special rates by which some people travel cheaper than others. Why should not all be treated alike? Then why is it that the railways do not charge in the same way for carrying passengers as they do for carrying freight, that is to say, so much a pound? Why should thin men have to pay the same fare as fat men when it takes less engine power to haul them?—Dundas Banner.

Impartial Baptism.

Master Ned (to the Rev. Dr. Trehern)—Wished I had been here last night when you baptized the company.

There are rumors of trouble at St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary last night, how serious is not known. If it was a revolt it was promptly quelled, and it is difficult to ascertain any reliable facts. The Warden says it was only a quarrel between two convicts, which created a little temporary excitement. There is a suspicion, however, that it was more serious than this.

Sir Henry James continued his speech for the Times before the Parnell Commission yesterday. He endeavored to show that Mr. Davitt associated in America and elsewhere with persons engaged in treasonable practices, who were seeking to separate Ireland from Great Britain. He charged that the leaders of the Nationalists were trying to keep affairs in Ireland in an unsettled condition.

The young lad Thos. Murphy, Galt, who on Monday ran away with a horse and vehicle belonging to his employer, being captured at Stratford, was on Thursday sentenced by Judge Lacourse to Kingston penitentiary for a term not less than three and not exceeding five years. Murphy is about 15 years of age and has no relatives that he knows of, having been brought out from London, Eng., when very young by some of the societies which carry on the business of importing Old Country waifs into Canada.

Yesterday morning about 10 o'clock a serious accident happened to Arthur Chapman, agent of the C. O. Railway at Frankford, while engaged in braking on a car that was being shunted at Trenton. It is supposed he slipped when about to put on the brakes and fell off the top of the car, in front of it. One of the wheels passed over his right arm, close to the shoulder, almost severing it from his body. The wheel on the opposite side passed over his left foot, crushing it. He also sustained some injuries about the head. His recovery is doubtful.

A bold burglary was perpetrated at Dutton on Saturday. At 12.18 Mr. F. J Armstrong, M. C. R. agent, locked up his office and went to dinner. At 12 30 Mr. R J. Catley, who is working in Dutton, discovered that the door of the station had been forced open. The burglar had broken into the money drawer and secured the sum of $90. He left the lower left hand corner of a dollar bill in the drawer.

The North German Gazette says Emperor William, on his arrival at Athens, sent the following despatch to Prince Bismarck: "I have arrived at glorious old Athens after a voyage of intoxicating beauty. After a splendid reception from Prince and people your telegram was my first greeting from home. Hearty thanks for it. My first word back to the Fatherland is a salutation to you, sent from the City of Pericles, from the pillars of the Parthenon, the sublime aspect of which deeply impresses me."

The illness of the Duke of Edinburgh, which prevented his attending the funeral of King Luis in Lisbon on Saturday, is ascribed to a fainting fit experienced while visiting King Carlos. When he was attacked he fell to the floor, bruising his face badly. The Duke has sufficiently recovered to take his departure, and he paid a farewell visit to King Carlos yesterday. The bruises on his face are fast disappearing. He has gone to Madrid.

H. Bristow was head coachman for the Marquis of Lorne and Princess Louise when His Lordship was Governor-General of Canada. He is now engaged in the cab business at Ottawa. The other day he received a proof of the thoughtfulness of Her Highness, when he received in a parcel through the post a portion of the wedding cake that graced the marriage feast of the Earl of Fife and the daughter of the Prince of Wales.

A sad accident occurred on Saturday evening in Chaudiere, whereby a 6-year-old son of James McKinnon met his death. The unfortunate lad was riding on a load of lath belonging to Messrs. Perley & Pattee, when he fell off and was run over by one of the hind wheels, which passed over the middle of his body, causing shocking injuries and death in a few hours. The teamster was not to blame, and no inquest was held.

A sad accident occurred on Saturday evening in the Heard handle factory in St. Thomas, resulting in the maiming for life of James Kelly, the 17-year-old son of John Kelly, who resides on Walnut street. The young man was removing the cover from a planer when his left hand became caught, and was ground to a pulp, the flesh and bones being chopped into mince meat. Drs. Gustin and McLarty amputated the hand.

The coroner's jury has returned a verdict of death from scalding in the case of William Webb, the fourth victim of the Cephalonia explosion. The jury severely commented on the conduct of the Cunard Company in not furnishing evidence explaining the cause of the explosion and in taking the steamer to sea, leaving no officials behind. The coroner intimated that the Board of Trade would inquire strictly into the accident.

No action has been taken by the Dominion Government to prevent a repetition of the recent disastrous Quebec rock slide.

Prof. Gosche, occupant of the chair of Literature at the University at Halle, Germany, has committed suicide by cutting his throat.

Edward Boyd, aged 20, of Guelph had his foot so badly crushed by the cars at Detroit on Monday night that amputation was necessary.

A message has been received in Montreal from Mgr. Bosse, Vicar-Apostolic of Labrador, making an appeal on behalf of the famine-stricken people of the Labrador coast.

The American authorities have decided that Chinese laundrymen are laborers within the meaning of the Chinese Restriction Act, and are therefore prohibited from landing in the United States.

Mr. Wyndham, Mr. Balfour's secretary, speaking at Dover last night, after a visit to Dublin, announced that in 1890 Mr. Balfour would introduce in Parliament a measure providing for a large system of land purchases.

Madame Joly, of Terrebonne, while peeling potatoes in her kitchen on Sunday morning, suddenly fell dead on the floor. She was previously in apparently perfect health, and had visited her parents at Ste. Rose on the previous day.

It is understood that Mr. Shehyn, the Quebec Treasurer, and Mr. Garneau, Commissioner of Public Works, who are at present in Paris, are negotiating with French financial institutions for the conversion of the entire Quebec debt.

A tree on Dorchester street, Montreal, was set on fire last night by a wire coming in contact with it, and, in spite of the heavy rain, the flames burned up several of the upper branches and were only checked by the intervention of the eastern brigade.

Lord Hartington made a speech at Wolverhampton last night in reply to Mr. Gladstone's recent speech at Southport. He declared that Mr. Gladstone showed no inclination to give the order for a general advance, but rather for a prudent retreat.

In the Montreal Superior Court yesterday, Judge Jette decided that the Allan Steamship Company was liable for the depreciation of cattle detained by them owing to the longshoremen's strike of 1880, the strike, in the judgment of the court, not being an adequate excuse.

At the Guelph Assizes yesterday the Grand Jury brought in three true bills against W. H. Harvey for the murder of his wife and two daughters. His trial will probably commence to-day. Among the reports prevalent in the city one is that Harvey will plead guilty. His friends are making great efforts to prove he was insane at the time he committed the deed on the 26th of March last.

Fall Assizes.

Chief Justice Armour opened Court at Owen Sound last Tuesday, at 10 a.m. There are thirteen civil cases and nine criminal. After an able and elaborate address to the Grand Jury His Lordship took up the following:

McDonald v. Murray, an action for diverting water from its natural course and thereby flooding the defendant's land, occupied the greater part of the day, and resulted in a judgement for the plaintiff, an injunction being granted as prayed. Frost for plaintiff; Creasor Q.C., for defendant.

Stewart v. McEachern was an action for slander. Plaintiff an defendant own adjoining farms. It was undertaken between them that each was to keep up half of the line fence. Plaintiff removed some of the rails from defendant's part and placed them on his own half of the line fence. The defendant, in the course of a disagreement about some other matters, called the plaintiff a thief saying he had stolen his rails. The defendant admitted uttering the words, and entered a plea of justification. Verdict, $2.00 damages.

Wilson v. Neely, action to set aside an alleged fraudulent conveyance; verdict for plaintiff.

Powley v. Clarke.—An action for alleged illegal and excessive distress. Judgment reserved.

Sullivan v. McDonald—Action of ejectment. Verdict for plaintiff.

Queen v. Snell.—Prisoner was charged with the larceny of a thirty-six dollar barrel of cider. The evidence was very strong, but circumstantial. Verdict, not guilty. The chief justice, in discharging the prisoner, told him in future to get his cider at home and not at his neighbor's.

Queen v. Owen.—Prisoner was charged with having assaulted one Brown with intent to do him grievous harm. Verdict, guilty; sentence reserved.

Queen v. Margaret Agnew.—Prisoner was charged with arson. Acquitted.

Queen v. Bowie.—Prisoner was charged with having committed perjury. Verdict guilty.

McMillan v. Owen Sound, an action for damages for injuries sustained in a fall by the plaintiff, the result of a defective sidewalk, was tried. The jury gave a verdict awarding $200 damages to the plaintiff.

In Lang v. Dawson, a garnishee issue, judgment was reserved.

Alexander Ovens, who was found guilty of maliciously wounding, was sentenced to six months in the Central Prison, and Ezekell Bowie, who was convicted on the same day of perjury, to one year.

The case of Beam v Johnston, an action for overpayment of money for telegraph poles, and for damages for non-fulfilment of contract, was tried, and was the final case. Judgement was reserved.

Prize Essay.

Following is the prize essay on how to run a hundred acre farm, written by Mr. Jos. McArdle, of Hopeville, in response to a request from the directers of East Grey Agricultural Society for a competition of ideas on that head. Mr. McArdle's is a strictly sensible, practical essay, and we are not surprised that his should carry off the palm.

Agriculture is a beneficial, healthy and honorable occupation.

THE FOREST.

It is not out of place to say a few words regarding the clearing of the forest, as it is one of the first works of the husbandman, also because there is considerable clearing to be done in this part of our county.—Grey. In order to take advantage both of clearing and tilling the land properly, all the underbrush and lying logs should be cut, and the brush piled in the fall before the snow gets too deep. In the winter, after disposing of all valuable timber, including fire wood for home use, the remainder should be cut into lengths such as a team could easily draw. The spring rains will wilt and partly rot the brush, which will be easily consumed in the month of June. By great industry a field could be logged, plowed and sown in turnips, which sometimes gives an abundant recompense for the labor. If prevented from having a crop of turnips, a crop of fall wheat would be likely to yield well if the land was high and dry. New land should be seeded down with timothy and clover for the first crop and thus left for at least six years. In this way grass will grow in many parts that could not be plowed, and returns secured which could not otherwise be had.

THE FARM.

The second breaking up is considerable trouble, but the roots and stumps have become rotten and many hardwood ones will burn completely out in a dry season. When the ground is plowed, the roots should be piled up and burned, stones drawn into piles for future use, such as building fences or tilling purposes. After two or three crops, the land having received a good plowing and harrowing spring and fall so as to level it, it is in better condition for more statesmanlike farming. For every eighty or ninety acres of arable land there should be a team kept for the purpose of ploughing, if ploughing weather. I approve of running a gang plow immediately after the early harvest, and turning a furrow not over two inches deep, which will bury lightly all the wild seeds, and the rain and warm weather will cause them to germinate and thus be destroyed. It will also turn up the roots of other weeds whereby the warm sun will often kill them. It will also rot the sod, so that when the subsoil is turned up in the fall or early spring, a mellow bed will be procured for the seed.

In order to keep the land well fertilized, special attention will have to be paid to the care of manure. In tilling the land, good ploughing and harrowing are not the least of the many important duties of a farmer, as there is considerable difference in land. His constant aim should be to study the nature of the soil, and see also that it is cultivated to suit the crops he intends to raise, likewise that the seed sown is suitable to the land. For the first crop after breaking up I prefer peas, for the second, wheat, afterwards a crop of oats or barley and seed down, or in place of this last crop it might be well to sow it in roots, being careful to keep them free from weeds; it should be seeded down with the next crop.

THE STOCK.

As this section of country produces a large amount of second class grain, also an abundant crop of grasses, every farmer should pay special attention to stock raising. On every hundred acre farm there should be required a heavy team of good working horses, (not to sell your best stock and keep inferior animals for working) one or two brood mares so that there could be an additional team in hurried times, and eight or ten good milch cows. All the calves should be kept so that there would be a large number of young cattle for fattening in summer or stall feed in winter, a number of hogs—about as many in summer as there are cows, so as to utilize all the refuse milk. Such milk, with a small quantity of unsaleable grain would keep them growing all summer, and a little extra feeding in the fall would leave them fit for winter market. All grain used for feeding, and especially for pigs should be ground. For such a stock as I have described would be required about twenty acres of pasture in addition to the after grass. I recommend a supply of green fodder for milch cows, say corn or tares, and recommend to put in a field of fall rye and kept for spring pasture so as to give clover a chance to grow, afterwards ploughed down, which would be equal to a light coat of manure. Ploughing down clover six or eight inches high greatly enriches the soil. I also approve of sowing buckwheat in a field that has been exhausted by successing cropping, and when it is in bloom, or about ten inches high it should be ploughed down. The stock should be turned on it so as to pick up any heads that may not be completely covered and tramp it down, which causes it to rot much sooner. Thus pasturing your cattle in summer with an ample supply of hay for cattle and sheep, I prefer clover, for horses timothy hay, and roots for winter use, stock can be kept growing all the time. Good stock alone pays. Old cows and steers should fatten with roots and coarse grain and help to raise the revenue of the farm.

THE ORCHARD.

In the southern part of this county fruit growing has been a failure, while in the northern part it has been a success, and although it has been a failure, I think that with care fruit can be grown to advantage. A good tract of ground should be selected, north and west sides planted with trees, so as to break the cold spring winds that so often destroy the blossom. Special care should be given to underdraining, as negligence in this has caused much of the unproductiveness of the orchard. Choice fruit should be in the centre so that after frosty nights the early sun will not wilt them. Water should be convenient to the orchard and the trees sprayed with a force pump or otherwise. Such washing is a great benefit, as it destroys all injurious insects, revives and nourishes the trees, and I do not hesitate to say that if such precautions were taken there would be quite an income from the orchard.

UNDERDRAINING.

As a large percentage of our land has a hardpan bottom, the water cannot filter through it but has to be evaporated from the surface. To remedy this, underdraining should be carried out. This should be done at spare times, before harvest, and when the land is in pasture or summer fallow.

THE BUILDINGS.

I prefer a good bank barn with front facing the south, stone stabling and root cellar underneath, so that there would be no inconvenience in feeding. There should also be two side sheds so as to protect live stock and manure from the inclemency of the weather. Small stables might be constructed in side sheds suitable for pigs, sheep and poultry. In some commodious place there should be an excavation three or four feet deep, with substantial stone wall and a strong straight fence at the open sides at least four feet high to prevent cattle throwing one another into it. In this excavation should be put all waste straw. Muck might be drawn from the low lands together with the liquid from the stables which should be run into it by tubs. By means of a tramway its contents could be deposited on the land and would aid much in preventing the land from becoming run out. Never dispose of ashes, as they possess great fertilizing powers. Lime applied at intervals will also aid the fecundity of the soil. The situation of the farm buildings is a matter not easily decided, as all farms are not situated alike, but I should say on a farm where all the land is good the buildings should be at least forty rods from the concession. By being near the centre of the farm, there is considerable saving of time both in drawing grain and manure out. In case of accidents the house should be situated so as to afford an easy view of the barn and if possible on the east end or south side, as there is less danger from fire.

GENERAL.

The income derived from a properly managed farm would be large. There would be fat cattle, lambs, sheep, hogs, horses, occasionally grain and poultry to dispose of, and last, but not least, a constant flowing of money in butter and eggs.

Seed grains should be changed about every third year. Stock should be improved by breeding from the best sires. Homes should be beautified by planting trees and shrubbery in the lanes and lawns. Farm literature should form an important part of the library, and your homes would be beneficial, healthy and honorable.

Yours truly,
JOSEPH McARDLE.

A Boil on the Back of the Neck.

Each heart has its moments of pleasure and pain
That follow the ebb and the flow;
Each soul has its portion of sunshine and rain,
Hope dawnings and sunsets of woe.
But there 're few other evils to which flesh is heir
That with sorrow our joy can so fleck,
And fill our whole being with so much despair,
As a boil on the back of the neck.

A man's wife may tell him in tones low and sweet
Her mother is coming to stay,
He may tread a banana peel down in the street
And swear in a dignified way.
Somebody may walk on his favorite corn,
He may foolishly cash a snide check,
But the one thing that makes him regret he was born
Is a boil on the back of the neck.

The brooklet e'en sings in a sad undertone,
The skies are all clouded with care,
And nature's voice echoes a saddening moan,
The breezes come freighted with care.
The future is naught but a desert of night,
The present a miserable wreck,
Without even just one faint spark of delight,
For the man with a boil on his neck.

Cupid's Commercial Failure.

Negotiations now have ceased, the game is called a draw,
Miss Caldwell with her millions failed to capture Prince Murat.

He brought to her a title of distinction to be sold,
She was to buy the bauble and to pay for it in gold.

While there would be no limit to the title he would bring,
He soon discovered all her gold was anchored to a string.

The title of "The Princess," which nobility holds dear,
She wished him to bestow for just a paltry sum per year.

While she would bear the name which his nobility confers,
The bank account, as heretofore, would still be kept in hers.

An heiress who will titles estimate so very low
Deserves to finally become plain Mrs. So-and-so.

AN AMERICAN GIRL.

CHAPTER XXI.

LORD LANSDOWNE.

One morning in the following week, Mrs. Burnham attired herself in her second-best black silk, and, leaving the Misses Burnham practising diligently, turned her steps toward Oldclough Hall. Arriving there, she was ushered into the blue drawing room by Dobson, in his character of footman, and in a few minutes Lucia appeared.

When Mrs. Burnham saw her, she assumed a slight air of surprise.

"Why, my dear," she said, as she shook hands, "I should scarcely have known you."

And though this was something of an exaggeration, there was some excuse for the exclamation. Lucia was looking very charming, and several changes might be noted in her attire and appearance. The ugly twist had disappeared from her delicate head, and in its place were soft, loose waves and light puffs; she had even ventured on allowing a few ringed locks to stray on to her forehead; her white morning-dress no longer wore the trade-mark of Miss Chickie, but had been remodeled by some one of more taste.

"What a pretty gown, my dear!" said Mrs. Burnham, glancing at it curiously. "A Watteau plait down the back—isn't it a Watteau plait? and little ruffles down the front, and pale pink bows. It is quite like some of Miss Octavia Bassett's dresses, only not so over-trimmed."

"I did not think Octavia's dresses would seem over-trimmed if she wore them in London or Paris," said Lucia bravely. "It is only because we are so very quiet, and dress so little in Slowbridge, that they seem so."

"And your hair!" remarked Mrs. Burnham. "You drew your idea of that from some style of hers, I suppose. Very becoming indeed. Well, well! And how does Lady Theobald like all this, my dear?"

"I am not sure that——" Lucia was beginning, when her ladyship interrupted her by entering.

"My dear Lady Theobald," cried her visitor, rising, "I hope you are well. I have just been complimenting Lucia upon her pretty dress and her new style of dressing her hair. Miss Octavia Bassett has been giving her the benefit of her experience, it appears. We have not been doing her justice. Who would have believed that she had come from Nevada to improve us?"

"Miss Octavia Bassett," said my lady, sonorously, "has come from Nevada to teach our young people a great many things—new fashions in duty, and demeanor, and respect for their elders. Let us hope they will be benefited."

"If you will excuse me, grandmamma," said Lucia, speaking in a soft, steady voice, "I will go and write the letters you wished written."

"Go," said my lady, with majesty, and having bidden Mrs. Burnham good morning, Lucia went.

If Mrs. Burnham had expected any explanation of her ladyship's evident displeasure, she was doomed to disappointment. That excellent and rigorous gentlewoman had a stern sense of dignity, which forbade her condescending to the confidential weakness of mere ordinary mortals. Instead of referring to Lucia, she broached a more commonplace topic.

"I hope your rheumatism does not threaten you again, Mrs. Burnham," she remarked.

"I am very well, thank you, my dear," said Mrs. Burnham, "so well, that I am thinking quite seriously of taking the dear girls to the garden-party, when it comes off."

"To the garden-party!" repeated her ladyship. "May I ask who thinks of giving a garden-party in Slowbridge?"

"It is no one in Slowbridge," replied this lady, cheerfully. "Some one who lives a little out of Slowbridge—Mr. Burmistone, my dear, Lady Theobald, at his new place."

"Mr. Burmistone!"

"Yes, my dear, and a most charming affair it is to be, if we are to believe all we hear. Surely you have heard something of it from Mr Barold?"

"Mr. Barold has not been to Oldclough for several days."

"Then he will tell you when he comes, for I suppose he has as much to do with it as Mr. Burmistone."

"I have heard before," announced my lady, "of men of Mr. Burmistone's class securing the services of persons of established position in society when they wished to spend their money upon entertainments, but I should scarcely have imagined that Francis Barold would have allowed himself to be made a party to such a transaction."

"But," put in Mrs. Burnham, rather eagerly, "it appears that Mr. Burmistone is not such an obscure person, after all. He is an Oxford man, and came off with honors; he is quite a well-born man, and gives this entertainment in honor of his friend and relation, Lord Lansdowne."

"Lord Lansdowne!" echoed her ladyship, sternly.

"Son of the Marquis of Lauderdale, whose wife was Lady Honoro Erroll."

"Did Mr. Burmistone give you this information?" asked Lady Theobald, with ironic calmness.

Mrs. Burnham colored ever so faintly.

"I—that is to say—there is a sort of acquaintance between one of my maids and the butler at the Burmistone place, and when the girl was doing Lydia's hair, she told her the story. Lord Lansdowne and his father are quite fond of Mr. Burmistone, it is said."

"It seems rather singular to my mind that we should not have known of this before."

"But how should we learn? We none of us know Lord Lansdowne, or even the marquis. I think he is only a second or third cousin. We are little—just a little—set in Slowbridge, you know, my dear—at least I have thought so, sometimes lately,"

"I must confess," remarked my lady, "that I have not regarded the matter in that light."

"That is because you have a better right to—to be a little set than the rest of us," was the amiable response.

Lady Theobald did not disclaim the privilege. She felt the sentiment an extremely correct one. But she was not very warm in her manner during the remainder of the call, and, incongruous as such a statement may appear, it must be confessed that she felt that Miss Octavia Bassett must have something to do with these defections on all sides, and that garden-parties, and all such swervings from established Slowbridge custom, were the natural result of Nevada frivolity and freedom of manners. It may be that she felt remotely that even Lord Lansdowne and the Marquis of Lauderdale were to be referred to the same reprehensible cause, and that, but for Octavia Bassett, Mr. Burmistone would not have been educated at Oxford and have come off with honors, and have turned out to be related to respectable people, but would have remained in appropriate obscurity.

"I suppose," she said, afterwards, to Lucia, "that your friend Miss Octavia Bassett is in Mr. Burmistone's confidence, if no one else has been permitted to have that honor. I have no doubt she has known of this approaching entertainment for some weeks."

"I do not know, grandmamma," replied Lucia, putting her letters together, and gaining color as she bent over them. She was wondering, with inward trepidation, what her ladyship would say if she knew the whole truth—if she knew that it was her grand-daughter, not Octavia Bassett, who enjoyed Mr. Burmistone's confidence

"Ah," she thought, "how could I ever dare to tell her?"

The same day Francis Barold sauntered up to pay them a visit, and then, as Mrs. Burnham had prophesied, Lady Theobald heard all she wished to hear, and, indeed, a great deal more.

"What is this I am told of Mr. Burmistone, Francis?" she inquired. "That he intends to give a garden-party, and that Lord Lansdowne is to be one of the guests, and that he has caused it to be circulated that they are cousins."

"That Lansdowne has cause it to be circulated—or Burmistone?"

"It is scarcely likely that Lord Lansdowne——"

"Beg pardon," he interrupted, fixing his single glass dexterously in his right eye, and gazing at her ladyship through it. "Can't see why Lansdowne should object. Fact is, he is a great deal fonder of Burmistone than relations usually are of each other. Now I often find that kind of thing a bore, but Lansdowne doesn't seem so. They were at school together, it seems, and at Oxford, too, and Burmistone is supposed to have behaved pretty well towards Lansdowne at one time, when he was rather a wild fellow—so the father and mother say. As to Burmistone 'causing it to circulated,' that sort of thing is rather absurd. The man isn't a cad, you know."

"Pray don't say 'you know,' Francis," said her ladyship. "I know very little but what I have chanced to see, and I must confess I have not been prepossessed in Mr. Burmistone's favor. Why did he not choose to inform us——"

"That he was Lord Lansdowne's second cousin, and knew the Marquis of Lauderdale, grandmamma?" broke in Lucia, with very pretty spirit. "Would that have prepossessed you in his favor? Would you have forgiven him for building the mills, on Lord Lansdowne's account? I—I wish I was related to a marquis," which was very bold indeed.

"May I ask," said her ladyship, in her most monumental manner, "when you became Mr. Burmistone's champion?"

CHAPTER XXII.

"YOU HAVE MADE IT LIVELIER."

When she had become Mr. Burmistone's champion indeed! She could scarcely have told when, unless, perhaps, she had fixed the date at the first time she heard his name introduced at a high tea, with every politely opprobrious epithet affixed. She had defended him in her own mind then, and felt sure that he deserved very little that was said against him, and very likely nothing at all. And the first time she had seen and spoken to him, she had been convinced that she had not made a mistake, and that he had been treated with cruel injustice. How kind he was, how manly, how clever, and how well he bore himself under the popular adverse criticism! She only wondered that anybody could be so blind, and stupid, and wilful as to assail him.

And if this had been the case in those early days, imagine what she felt now, when—ah, well!—when her friendship had had time and opportunity to become a much deeper sentiment. Must it be confessed that she had seen Mr. Burmistone even oftener than Octavia and Miss Belinda knew of? Of course it had all been quite accidental; but it had happened that now and then, when she had been taking a quiet walk in the lanes about Oldclough, she had encountered a gentleman, who had dismounted, and led his horse by the bridle, as he sauntered by her side. She had always been very timid at such times and had felt rather like a criminal; but Mr. Burmistone had not been timid at all, and would, indeed, as soon have met Lady Theobald as not, for which courage his companion admired him more than ever. It was not very long before to be with this hero re-assured her, and made her feel stronger and more self-reliant. She was never afraid to open her soft little heart to him, and show him innocently all its goodness and ignorance of worldliness. She warmed and brightened under his kindly influence, and was often surprised in secret at her own simples readiness of wit and speech.

"It is odd that I am such a different girl when—when I am with you," she said to him, one day. "I even make little jokes. I should never think of making even the tiniest joke before grandmamma. Somehow, she never seems quite to understand jokes. She never laughs at them. You always laugh, and I am sure it is very kind of you to encourage me so; but you must not encourage me too much, or I might forget, and make a little joke at dinner, and I think, if I did, she would choke over her soup."

Perhaps, when she had dressed her hair and adorned herself with pale pink bows, and like appurtenances, this artful young person had privately in mind other beholders than Mrs. Burnham, and other commendation than that to be bestowed by that most excellent matron.

"Do you mind me telling you that you have put on an enchanted garment," said Mr. Burmistone, the first time they met when she wore one of the old-new gowns. "I though' I knew before how——."

"I don't mind at all," said Lucia, blushingly brilliantly. "I rather like it. It rewards me for my industry. My hair is dressed in a new way. I hope you like that, too. Grandmamma does not."

It had been Lady Theobald's habit to to treat Lucia severely from a sense of duty. Her manner towards her had always rather the tone of implying that she was naturally at fault, and yet her ladyship could not have told wherein she wished the girl changed. In the good old school in which my lady had been trained, it was customary to regard young people as weak, foolish, and, if left to their own desires, frequently sinful. Lucia had not been left to own her desires. She had been taught to view herself, as rather a bad case, and to feel that she was far from being what her relatives had a right to expect. To be thrown with a person who did not find her silly, or dull, or commonplace, was a new experience.

"If I had been clever," Lucia said once to Mr Burmistone,—"if I had been clever, perhaps grandmamma would have been more satisfied with me. I have often wished I had been clever."

"If you had been a boy," replied Mr. Burmistone, rather grimly, "and had squandered her money, and run into debt, and bullied her, you would have been her idol, and she would have pinched and starved herself to supply your highness's extravagance."

When the garden-party rumor began to take definite form, and there was no doubt as to Mr. Burmistone's intentions, a discussion arose at once, and went on in every genteel parlor. Would Lady Theobald allow Lucia to go, and if she did not allow her, would not such a course appear very pointed indeed? It was universally decided that it would appear pointed, but that Lady Theobald would not mind that in the least, and perhaps would rather enjoy it than otherwise, and it was thought Lucia would have remained at home, if it had not been for the influence of Mr. Francis Barold.

Making a call at Oldclough, he found his august relative in a very majestic mood, and she applied to him again for information.

"Perhaps," she said, "you may be able to tell me whither it is true that Miss Belinda Bassett—Belinda Bassett," with emphasis, "has been invited by Mr. Burmistone to assist him to receive his guests."

"Yes, it is true," was the reply; "I think I advised it myself. Burmistone is fond of her. They are great friends. Man needs a woman at such times."

"And he chose Belinda Bassett?"

"In the first place, he is on friendly terms with her, as I said before," replied Barold; "in the second, she's just what he wants,—well-bred, kind-hearted, not likely to make rows, et cætera." There was a slight pause before he finished, adding quietly: "He's not a man to submit to being refused—Burmistone."

Lady Theobald did not reply, or raise her eyes from her work; she knew he was looking at her with calm fixedness, through the glass he held in its place so cleverly; and she detested this more than anything else; perhaps because she was invariably quelled by it, and found she had nothing to say.

He did not address her again, immediately, but turned to Lucia, drooping the eyeglasses, and resuming his normal condition.

"You will go, of course?" he said.

Lucia glanced across at my lady.

"I—do not know. Grandmamma——."

"Oh!" interposed Barold, "you must go. There is no reason for your refusing the invitation—unless you wish to imply something unpleasant—which is, of course, out of the question."

"But there may be reasons——," began her ladyship.

"Burmistone is my friend," put in Barold, in his coolest tone. "And I am your relative, which would make my position in his house a delicate one, if he has offended you."

When Lucia saw Octavia again, she was able to tell her that they had received invitations to the fete, and that Lady Theobald had accepted them.

"She has not spoken a word to me about it, but she has accepted them," said Lucia. "I don't quite understand her lately, Octavia. She must be very fond of Francis Barold. He never gives way to her in the least, and she always seems to submit to him. I know she would not have let me go, if he had not insisted on it, in that taking-it-for-granted way of his."

Naturally, Mr. Burmistone's fete caused great excitement. Miss Chickie was never so busy in her life, and there were rumors that her feelings had been outraged by the discovery that Mrs. Burnham had sent to Harriford for costumes for her daughters.

"Slowbridge is changing, mem," said Miss Chickie with brilliant sarcasm. "Our ladies are led in their fashions by a Nevada young person. We're improving most rapid—more rapid than I'd ever have dared to hope. Do you prefer a frill or flounce, mem?"

Octavia was in great good spirits at the prospect of the gayeties in question. She had been in remarkably good spirits for some weeks. She had received letters from Nevada, containing good news, she said. Shares had gone up again, and her father had almost settled his affairs, and it would not be long before he would come to England. She looked so exhilarated over the matter, that Lucia felt a little aggrieved.

"Will you be glad to leave us, Octavia?" she asked. "We shall not be glad to let you go. We have grown very fond of you."

"I shall be sorry to leave you; and Aunt Belinda is going with us. You don't expect me to be fond of Slowbridge, do you, and to be sorry I can't take Mrs. Burnham—and the rest?"

Barold was present when she made this speech, and it rather rankled.

"Am I one 'the rest'" he enquired, the first time he found himself alone with her. He was sufficiently piqued to forget his usual hateur and discretion.

"Would you like to be?" she said.

"Oh! very much—very much—naturally," he replied, severely.

They were standing near a rose-bush, in the garden, and she plucked a rose, and regarded it with deep interest.

"Well," she said, next, "I must say I think I shouldn't have had such a good time if you hadn't been here. You have made it livelier."

"Tha-anks," he remarked. "You are most kind."

"Oh!" she answered, "it's true. If it wasn't, I shouldn't say it. You, and Mr. Burmistone, and Mr. Poppleton have certainly made it livelier."

He went home in such bad humor that his host, who was rather happier than usual, commented upon his grave aspect at dinner.

"You look as if you had heard ill news, old fellow," he said. "What's up."

"Oh, nothing!" he was answered, sardonically; "nothing whatever — unless that I have been rather snubbed by a young lady from Nevada."

"Ah!" with great seriousness; "that's rather cool, isn't it?"

"It's her little way," said Barold. "It seems to be one of the customs of Nevada."

In fact, he was very savage indeed. He felt that he had condescended a good deal lately. He seldom bestowed his time on women, and when he did so, at rare intervals, he chose those who would do the most honor to his taste at the least cost of trouble. And he was obliged to confess to himself that he had broken his rule in this case. Upon analyzing his motives and necessities, he found that, after all, he must have extended his visit simply because he chose to see more of this young woman from Nevada, and that really, upon the whole, he had borne a good deal from her. Sometimes he had been much pleased with her, and very well entertained; but often enough—in fact rather too often she had made him exceedingly uncomfortable. Her manners were not what he was accustomed to; she did not consider that all men were not to be regarded from the same point of view. Perhaps he did not put into definite words the noble and patriotic sentiment that an Englishman was not to be regarded from the same point of view as an American, and that though all this sort of thing might do with fellows in New York, it was scarcely what an Englishman would stand. Perhaps, as I say, he had not put this sentiment into words; but it is quite certain that it had been uppermost in his mind upon more occasions than one. As he thought their acquaintance over, this evening, he was rather severe upon Octavia. He even roused so far as to condescend to talk her over with Burmistone.

"If she had been well brought up," he said, "she would have been a different creature."

"Very different, I have no doubt," said Burmistone, thoughtfully. "When you say well brought up, by the way, do you mean brought up like your cousin, Miss Gaston?"

"There is a medium," said Barold, loftily. "I regret to say Lady Theobald has not hit upon it."

"Well, as you say," commented Mr. Burmistone, "I suppose there is a medium."

"A charming wife she would make for a man with a position to maintain," remarked Barold, with a short and somewhat savage laugh.

"Octavia Bassett?" queried Burmistone. "That's true. But I am afraid she wouldn't enjoy it—if you are supposing the man to be an Englishman, brought up in the regulation groove."

"Ah!" exclaimed Barold, impatiently, "I was not looking at it from her point of view, but from his."

Mr. Burmistone slipped his hands in his pockets and jingled his keys slightly, as he did once before in an earlier part of this narrative.

"Ah! from his," he repeated. "Not from hers. His point of view would differ from hers—naturally."

Barold flushed a little, and took his cigar from his mouth to knock of the ashes.

"A man is not necessarily a snob," he said, "because he is cool enough not to lose his head where a woman is concerned. You can't marry a woman who will make mistakes, and attract universal attention by her conduct."

"Has it struck you that Octavia Bassett would?" inquired Burmistone.

"She would do as she chose," said Barold, petulantly. "She would do things which were unusual—but I am not referring to her in particular. Why should I?"

"Ah!" said Burmistone. "I only thought of her because it did not strike me that one would ever feel she had exactly blundered She is not easily embarrassed. There is a sang froid about her which carries things off."

"Ah!" deigned Barold, "she has sang froid enough and to spare."

He was silent for some time afterwards, and sat smoking later than usual. When he was about to leave the room for the night, he made an announcement for which his host was not altogether prepared.

"When the fete is over, my dear fellow,' he said, "I must go back to London, and I shall be deucedly sorry to do it."

"Look here!" said Burmistone, "that's a new idea, isn't it?"

"No, an old one; but I have been putting the thing off from day to day. By Jove! I did not think it likely that I should put it off, the day I landed here."

And he laughed, rather uneasily.

CHAPTER XXIII.

"MAY I GO?"

The very day after this, Octavia opened the fourth trunk. She had had it brought down from the garret, when there came a summons on the door, and Lucia Gaston appeared.

Lucia was very pale, and her large soft eyes wore a decidedly frightened look. She seemed to have walked fast, and was out of breath. Evidently something had happened.

"Octavia," she said, "Mr. Dugald Binnie is at Oldclough."

"Who is he?"

"He is my grand-uncle," exclaimed Lucia, tremulously. "He has a great deal of money. Grandmamma——" She stopped short, and colored, and drew her slight figure up. "I do not quite understand grandmamma, Octavia," she said. "Last night she came to my room to talk to me; and this morning she came again, and—oh!" she broke out indignantly, "how could she speak to me in such a manner!"

"What did she say?" inquired Octavia.

"She said a great many things," with great spirit. "It took her a long time to say them, and I do not wonder at it. It would have taken me a hundred years, if I had been in her place. I—I was wrong to say I did not understand her—I did—before she had finished."

"What did you understand?"

"She was afraid to tell me in plain words—I never saw her afraid before, but she was afraid. She has been arranging my future for me, and it does not occur to her that I dare object. That is because she knows I am a coward, and despises me for it—and it is what I deserve. If I make the marriage she chooses, she thinks Mr. Binnie will leave me his money. I am to run after a man who does not care for me, and make myself attractive, in the hope that he will condescend to marry me, because Mr. Binnie may leave me his money. Do you wonder that it took even Lady Theobald a long time to say that?"

"Well," remarked Octavia, "you won't do it, I suppose. I wouldn't worry. She wants you to marry Mr. Barold, I suppose."

Lucia started.

"How did you guess?" she exclaimed.

"Oh, I always knew it. I didn't guess." And she smiled ever so faintly. "That is one of the reasons why she loathes me so," she added.

Lucia thought deeply for a moment; she recognized, all at once, several things she had been mystified by before.

"Oh, it is! It is!" she said. "And she has thought of it all the time, when I never suspected her."

Octavia smiled a little again. Lucia sat thinking, her hands clasped tightly.

"I am glad I came here," she said at length. "I am angry now, and I see things more clearly. If she had only thought of it because Mr. Binnie came, I could have forgiven her more easily; but she been making coarse plans all the time, and treating me with contempt. "Octavia," she added, turning upon her, with flushing cheeks, and sparkling eyes, "I think that, for the first time in my life, I am in a passion—a real passion. I think I shall never be afraid of her any more." Her delicate nostrils were dilated, she held her head up, her breath came fast. There was a hint of exultation in her tone. "Yes," she said, "I am in a passion. And I am not afraid of her at all. I will go home and tell her what I think!"

And it is quite probable that she would have done so, but for a trifling incident which occurred before she reached her ladyship.

(To be Continued).

In His Proper Place.

Yes, "the world do move," after all. Those who were present at the meeting of the W. C. T. U. in the Baptist church one afternoon last week witnessed a sight which was calcuated to inspire the most ardent advocate of women's rights. Whilst the wives and daughters of the land were discussing the "third party" and other grave questions of state, one of the erstwhile "lord of creation" paced the corridors in the "lordly" endeavor of trying to keep his offspring from breaking out into open rebellion. The wives and daughters looked upon the sight with feelings of satisfaction at the thought that man had at last found his proper place, and the "yoke" had been broken. As for the fallen "lord," he presented the appearance of a man who was prepared to sell himself without making anything on the transaction.—Galt Reformer.

Barbers Have Good Eyes.

Ever get shaved by a barber who wore glasses? Just think over now, and see if you can remember any barber who ever wore glasses. I've been in the business 20 years, says a writer in the Chicago Tribune, and I would be more apt to see such barbers than you. I don't believe that I ever saw more than three. A man who can't see well has no business fooling around another man's face with a razor. I went into a recruiting office once thinking I would enlist. They asked me several questions, one of them being an inquiry about my business. I said I was a barber. The recruiting officer replied at once: "Then your eyesight is all right." I don't think I ever saw a cross-eyed barber in my life. As a rule, the barber's eyesight is better than any class or business or profession which you find.

The Smallest Republic in the World.

Probably the smallest republic in the world is the one which declared its independence on August 9th, at Franceville, one of the islands of the New Hebrides, and elected M. Chevilliard its President. The inhabitants consist of 40 Europeans (including a solitary Englishman, a missionary) and 500 black workmen employed by a French company. The new flag of the republic having been duly hoisted, the French gunboat Saone landed a detachment and saluted the flag.

—The man who does not find advertising profitable generally finds business unprofitable.

—A new Krupp gun beats the world. The calibre is 13¼ inches, barrel 40 feet in length, and its greatest diameter 6½ feet. It shoots 11 miles and fires two shots per minute, each shot costing between $1,250 and $1,500.

LORD STANLEY.

Characteristics, Official Work and Home Life of Canada's Present Governor-General — A Glimpse Within Rideau Hall.

From the New York Herald.

"Invariably honorable, just, bounteous, hospitable, valiant and magnificent; above all invariably loyal; that family may safely challenge history and tradition to show one defective link in its long chain of succession, to point to a single stain on the purity of its public conduct, or on its uniform exercise of the mild and graceful duties of private life."

Such is the estimate by a modern historian of the Stanleys, whose head is the Earl of Derby, and a scion of which, Lord Stanley of Preston, is Governor-General of Canada. Lord Stanley and a portion of his family are now on a tour, which will in all probability be extended to portions of the United States, and readers of the Herald will, therefore, doubtless find an account of His Lordship and of the Vice-Regal state in which he lives at Rideau Hall somewhat interesting.

Lord Stanley is a son of the fourteenth Earl of Derby. His brother, the present Earl, followed his father in adopting a public career, and father and son were more than once members of the same Cabinet. Fred Stanley, as the Governor-General of to-day was then familiarly called, at a very early age took a lieutenant's commission in the Grenadier Guards. In 1865 he was elected to Parliament and continued to be a member of the House until 1886, when he was created a peer with the title of Lord Stanley of Preston. During his career as a parliamentarian he filled various offices, such as Lord of the Admiralty, Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Secretary of State for War, Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education, Secretary of State for the Colonies and President of the Board of Trade. It may well be believed that as Secretary of State for the Colonies he got that insight into colonial affairs that stands him in good stead now.

DAILY LIFE IN RIDEAU HALL.

When settled at the Hall Lord Stanley's movements are quite methodical. His valet has everything prepared for the bath at 7 o'clock each morning, and at that hour he calls his master. After paying an Englishman's adoration to the goddess of cold water, and having attired himself in the garb chosen for him by the aforesaid autocratic factotum, His Lordship peruses the morning papers. He very rarely goes out before breakfast. That meal is served about 9 o'clock. All the family sit down to it, even Master Willie, who has only seen 11 summers. At other meals the presence of the younger members depends on circumstances. By about 10 o'clock His Excellency has disposed of breakfast and of the matutinal cigar, and at that time Captain Colville, his military secretary, is on hand with a formidable batch of official documents requiring his attention. His Excellency signs nothing without scanning it more or less carefully, occupying a position in that respect midway between Lord Lorne, who went on the principle that the officials who drew up the documents knew more about them than he did, and Lord Lansdowne, who went over every document with as suspicious a pencil as the city editor scanning the junior reporter's first production. Scarcely a State document went through his hands that was not marked with verbal emendations made in accordance with his fine sense of euphonious composition.

The luncheon hour is close at hand, when the last of the public duties have been disposed of, and at that refection, as a general rule, the household, young and old, assemble.

Lord Stanley's afternoon employment is variable, although he makes it a point to take a drive, and, if the weather is favorable and the exacting public does not draw him away, he goes down to the cricket or football field. Of the latter game he merely remains a spectator, but in the former he frequently takes part and wields a mighty effective bat. Although an ancestor established that British mania, the Derby, His Lordship is not himself a particular devotee of horse flesh. His carriage horses are sleek and well groomed, but there appears to be no horsey strain in his blood. Indeed His Excellency's virtues are essentially of the domestic and public kind. He is an excellent type of the English nobility, which has contributed in a larger degree than is generally believed in erecting and maintaining the structure of British greatness. The lives, the sayings and doings of such men as Lord Stanley of Preston do not make such spicy reading as the escapades of a Hastings or a Marlborough, and therefore we hear less in the public prints of the virtues of the English nobility than we do of their vices.

A REPAST IN STATE.

By about 7 o'clock the duties and avocations of the afternoon have been attended to or enjoyed, and the entire household seek their rooms to dress for dinner. This repast is served with the same state, whether the guests are present or not. Everybody dresses for it; even when the young boys are accorded the privilege of dining with mother they come down in their Eton jackets, which is a school boy's full dress. The dinner, more especially if there are guests, is a lengthy affair, the gentlemen lingering over the mahogany for a great part of the evening. When it is finished, however, the family are very fond of getting up amateur musical entertainments. His Excellency, like a true Lancashire lad, is a fiddler; one or two of the boys essay the same noble instrument; Mrs. Bagot, wife of Captain Bagot, who was there last winter, was an accomplished musician, and with the aid of one or two local instrumentalists and vocalists most ambitious musical seances were held at the hall two or three times a week. These were never kept up to a late hour, early to bed being a household rule.

LADY STANLEY'S DOMESTIC LIFE.

The world does not usually credit the homes of the high ones of the earth with any striking exemplification of those simpler domestic joys that poets and moralists have united in awarding only to the humble and lowly. The pomps of power and wealth are supposed to exclude these; but an acquaintance with the domestic concerns of these scions of one of the most illustrious families in Europe would dispel this idea. Love in the castle produces the same sweet influence that it does in the cottage. If you could see one of Lady Stanley's big young boys come into the morning room in his blanket coat, liberally besprinkled with snow, his cheeks red with Jack Frost's pinches, and throw his arms around his mother and kiss her just in the good old fashioned way that your boy or my boy does you would realize the truth of Tennyson's verse:

Kind hearts are more than coronets
And simple faith than Norman blood.

A mother is a boy's mother whether she be a Clarendon or a Smith. And that is the keynote of the Governor General's family. The circumstance of lofty position has never been allowed to crowd out those dear ineradicable human feelings and affections that are the basis of the family life and the corner stones of the whole social fabric.

WHO LADY STANLEY IS.

Lady Stanley is a Villiers, a sister of the present Lord Clarendon.

The first Earl Clarendon was that noble historian whose history of the Rebellion has become an English classic. His daughter Anne Hyde married the ill-fated King James the second, becoming mother of Mary and Anne, who successively filled the throne of Great Britain. The last Lord Clarendon of the Hyde family left an only child, a daughter, who married Thomas Villiers, in whom the title of Lord Carendon was subsequently revived. Vice-regal state should sit easily on the shoulders of a lady whose family has made honorable alliance with royalty itself. And it does. Lady Stanley's air is a beautiful mixture of the grande haut ton, the woman and the mother. She takes a lively interest in all that goes on around her.

A FAMILY OF TEN CHILDREN.

Lady Stanley has brought her lord ten children, of whom two are dead, a boy and a girl. The boy was twin brother of George.

The present Earl of Derby has no children and Lord Stanley is next of kin. His eldest son, Lord Edward Stanley, if he runs the allotted span, will certainly be Earl of Derby, and a worthy successor he will make to that long roll of noblemen. He is now 24 years of age, a lieutenant, as his father was before him, in the Grenadier Guards. Lord Edward was a bachelor when he arrived in Canada. After staying here but a few weeks he returned to England and was married to Lady Alice Montagu, youngest daughter of the Duke of Manchester. The young lady is a sister of that George Victor Drogo Montagu, Lord Mandeville, who married Miss Consuelo Yznaga, the American heiress. He returned to Canada with his bride and the young couple are now travelling with His Excellency.

THE BOYS.

Victor, the second boy, is a sailor, and he is every inch a sailor, with the bluff, hearty ways that seem inseparable from the sea. While here last winter on furlough he was continually incurring reprimands from his mother for sailing into the drawing-room puffing a cigarette, and there was nothing for it but to open a window and toss it into the snow. He was an immense favorite with the Ottawa ladies and certainly returned their admiration to the full. As a sailor should be, he is fond of a scrimmage.

Arthur, the third boy, who is now at Cambridge, is the scholar of the family. He has achieved unusual distinction in that line. In a competitive examination among twenty of the great public schools in England Arthur came out first in modern languages. He is intended for the diplomatic service and will undoubtedly in future sustain the Stanley name for distinguished public service. The other boys are Ferdinand, George, Algernon and Willie.

Willie is the baby. He is eleven years old. Ferdinand has chosen the profession of arms and is a second lieutenant in the Third and Fourth Battalions of the King's Own Regiment. George is at Cambridge and Algernon and Willie are at one of the English public schools.

THE LITTLE LADY ISABEL.

The only member of the family now at home besides Edward is Lady Isabel, a flaxen haired miss of fourteen. She is an energetic little lady, and when at Ottawa her great delight is to come up town with her governess and "do" the stores. The carriage, with a patient footman and driver, follows her about while she flits from store to store, having heaps of fun.

The Prince of Wales in Egypt.

A Paris cable has the following: The Republique Francaise says: England cannot be surprised that no one in Egypt consented to fete the Prince of Wales as though he was on a triumphal quasi-royal tour. France and the other Powers, which have not ceased to regard Egypt as a Turkish dependency, in no way bound to Great Britain by protectoral vassalage, still demand the evacuation of the country by the English. The Cairo incident, the paper says, proves that Europe is not disposed to allow the Egyptian question to sink into oblivion. France will lose no opportunity to remind England of her solemn engagement in regard to Egypt.

The Woman Who Laughs.

For a good, every-day household angel, give us the woman who laughs. Her biscuits may not be just right, and she may occasionally burn her bread and forget to replace dislocated buttons, but for solid comfort all day and every day, she is a very paragon. Home is not a battle-field, nor life an unending row. The trick of always seeing the bright side, or if the matter has no bright side, of shining up the dark one, is a very important faculty, one of the things which no woman should be without. We are not all born with the sunshine in our hearts, as the Irish prettily term it, but we can cultivate a cheerful sense of humor if we only try.—Rural New Yorker.

There are ten police matrons in Chicago selected by the W.C.T.U. More than 11,000 women passed through the stations last year, and to each one the way was offered to a better life.

A Senator asked Mrs. Sallie Chapin why women did not leave the temperance work to men, to make the laws; they would be responsible and take the consequences. "Because," she answered, "you do the work now, and the women take the consequences."

THE JESUIT MONEY.

The Parties Who Got a Share of the Filthy Lucre.

The Montreal Witness of Wednesday says: The 5th of November, 1889, will be remembered as a historical day in Montreal, the day upon which the "settlement" of the famous Jesuits' Estates question was consummated by the handing over $400,000 of Provincial Government money to Father Turgeon, representing the Jesuit Order in Canada for the occasion, in consideration of the Order's total and perpetual abandonment of claims to those estates. The proceedings were held in the Government offices on St. Gabriel street, and were intentionally surrounded with all possible splendor and eclat. Prelates and priests were there, members of Parliament and of the Legislature, and a number of politicians of every kind. At precisely 11 a. m., the hour appointed for the important meeting, Premier Mercier entered the Council Chamber, accompanied by his two sons and by three of his colleagues, Mr. Turcotte, Col. Rhodes and Mr. Gagnon. He was closely followed by Monsignor Labelle in his brilliant scarlet robes, Monsignor Tetu, representing Cardinal Taschereau, the Rev. Father Turgeon, S. J., the Rev. Mr. Racicot, representing Archbishop Fabre, the Rev. Fathers Vignon, Hudon, Lemire and Jones (four Jesuit priests), the Rev. Mr Gagnon, representing the Quebec Laval University, and others.

Mr. Mercier took the chair at the head of the table, having Monsignor Labelle on his right and Mayor Grenier on his left; the members of the Cabinet took seats around the table, and when the other persons present had also been invited to be seated, the Premier called upon Mr. Lussier, Notary Public, to read the deed of agreement about to be signed between the Government and the Jesuits. The document was read in a clear, solemn voice. In it were recited the different clauses of the Jesuits' Act and the stipulations by which for the consideration of $400,000, to be divided as stated below, Father Turgeon abandons all claim to the Jesuits' estates, in the name of the Jesuits' Order, both ancient and present, and in the name of the Pope, the Propaganda and the Church.

The contract having been read, Mr. Mercier, addressing the Assistant Provincial Secretary, said, "Now, Mr. Mitchell, bring out the cheques."

Mr. Mitchell took out of his portfolio the precious slips of paper, twelve in number, duly numbered and made out as follows:

One hundred and sixty thousand dollars for the Jesuits.

One hundred thousand dollars for the Laval University, Quebec.

Forty thousand dollars for Laval University, Montreal.

Twenty thousand dollars for the Apostolic Prefecture of the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

Ten thousand dollars for the Quebec archbishopric.

Ten thousand dollars for the Montreal archbishopric.

Ten thousand dollars for the Chicoutimi bishopric.

Ten thousand dollars for the bishopric of Nicolet.

Ten thousand dollars for the bishopric of Three Rivers.

Ten thousand dollars for the bishopric of St. Hyacinthe.

Ten thousand dollars for the bishopric of Sherbrooke.

Five thousand two hundred and sixty dollars, representing the interest due to the Jesuit Fathers.

All the cheques were made payable at the Bank of Montreal and subject to the order of Father Turgeon. They were handed one by one to the rev. father by Mr. Mitchell, the notary at the same time calling out the numbers and amounts. The rev. father smiled, his attorney, Mr. Lamothe, and Mr. Mercier closely watching each cheque as it was handed. "If they are not correct, say so," remarked Mr. Mercier with a smile.

THE TELEPHONE ROASTING.

Startling Scene in a Down East Doctor's Home.

Dr. A. R. Rice has a cool head, but he was a pretty thoroughly frightened man for about half an hour just before supper last evening. He heard a humming noise during the afternoon, but attributed it to the quinine he had handled during the day. The humming changed to a sizzling sound about 5 o'clock and there was an occasional crackle. The doctor rubbed his eyes to be sure that they were all right, for the room seemed to be filling with sulphurous smoke. The sizzling sounded like water, and think ing the pipes must have burst, the doctor rushed upstairs. While he was investigating a shriek from a young woman in his office fairly made his hair stand on end. Smoke was coming out of the door as he ran back to his office. There was no need to call his attention to the cause of the trouble. His telephone was fairly roasting before his eyes, the charring wood sending out thick smoke, while a small artillery fire was in progress from the tips of the melting wires. A messenger was sent for help, while the family stood before the melting telephone with buckets of water, expecting it to burst into flame. The doctor suspected what the trouble was, and had sent a messenger to the electric-light station. Before he could get halfway there a telephone company employee rushed in without the ceremony of knocking; he gave a frightened glance at the smoldering telephone and rushed into the back yard. Grasping a hoe lying near, he tore the wires from the side of the house. The remains of the telephone cooled down, but the live wires spat fire at each other in an alarming way last evening, and the family did not get much rest.—Springfield Republican.

SUDDEN DEATHS OF ACTORS.

Tragic Endings in the Past, Even on the Stage Itself.

The audience of the New York Lyceum Theatre on Tuesday night had a sensation of the most tragic character in the death of the comedian Charles B. Bishop. This adds one more to the sad list of those who have died on the stage, and which includes some once noted names. In Great Britain, Palmer, who was almost a star, fell dead while playing before a Liverpool audience. Peg Woffington, while playing Rosalind, was paralyzed and never recovered. She had just uttered the words, "I'd kiss as many of you as pleased me," when her voice was hushed and was never again heard on the stage. The once famous comedian Foote was also paralyzed while performing in his own comedy "The Devil on Two Sticks," and never recovered. Another case was that of Moody, who held respectable rank on the British stage and whose last appearance was as Claudis in "Measure for Measure." Just as he exclaimed, "Aye, but to die and go we know not where," he sank to the floor and was borne off a corpse. James Bland, who also had a respectable position in the profession, expired in the Strand Theatre. Edmund Kean affords another very impressive instance. While playing Othello in London, just as he exclaimed, "Oh, then, farewell," he fell into the arms of his son (who took the role of Iago), and he had just strength enough to say, "Speak to them, Charles, I am dying." He was borne off and revived for a while, but death soon closed his checkered career. Hanley, the comedian, became speechless on the stage after uttering the words of Launcelot Gobbo, "I have an exposition of sleep come over me," and he never spoke again. Cummings, who occasionally appeared in tragedy, expired while performing the role of Duemont in "Jane Snore." Barrett, who was so clever in old men's parts, died after playing Polonius, and was carried home a corpse. Mrs. Glover was struck with paralysis on the occasion of her farewell benefit and died three days afterward. Mrs. Linley, the once popular vocalist, expired at a concert while singing "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth." A very remarkable occurrence of this kind took place at the Holliday Street Theatre, Baltimore, in 1874. John Ferris, while playing a leading role in "Lady Audley's Secret," was borne off the stage in a helpless condition and died before morning. McCullough broke down on the stage in a manner that proved worse than death, for he only survived to become a lunatic, and now we have the shocking death of poor Bishop.

A New Canadian Cable.

Canada is now in a fair way of geting an Atlantic cable of her own. The efforts of Mr. Dobell as promoter are reported to have been successful, and it is said that the manufacture of the cable, which will be of the best kind, will be vigorously pushed next year. The cost is put down at $1,500,000, for which sum the work can be done. If, as alleged, Canadian cable messages count 800 a day, it will be a mistake to assume that they will ever all go by one cable. Like all new cable companies, this one appears to contemplate a reduction of the rate charged for messages; but, with a few exceptions, competition has led to amalgamation of competing lines, and a serious waste of capital has resulted from the multiplication of cables. Canada ought, for some reasons, to have a cable of her own. Our press despatches, it is sometimes complained, are filtered through a foreign channel, but it is certain that the Canadian press cannot compete with the American in the collection and transmission of press dispatches. Still it may do something on its own account without breaking off existing connections.—Toronto Monetary Times.

Origin of Lord Mayor's Day.

Saturday is the 700th anniversary of the mayoralty of one Fitz Alwyn, in Richard the Lion Heart's time, and the institution of Lord Mayor has always been traced back to him as the founder by city historians. It is a very striking fact that, while the chief event of his mayoralty was a savage, bloody raid on the Jews, who were plundered, tortured and expelled by wholesale, the incoming Mayor, who is to celebrate Fitz Alwyn's septcentenary, is a strictly orthodox Jew named Isaacs. He carries his religious observance to the point of quitting the gaudy Lord Mayor's next Saturday, when the procession reaches Houndsditch, and going through that whole Jewish quarter humbly on foot, in order that his co-religionists may not be scandalized by the spectacle of his riding at ease on the Hebrew Sabbath.—New York Times' London Letter.

Ladies Who Use the Foils.

Those who understand and enjoy the art of fencing, says a London letter to the Philadelphia Telegraph, are becoming very numerous nowadays. Indeed, it is said it will be quite the fashion the coming winter.

Now that ladies have taken up the exercise in earnest, it will no doubt be the rage for a while. Graceful figures are never seen to greater advantage than when practising the art of swordsmanship.

The Prince of Wales' daughters are all expert with the foil, and many of the ladies who weary themselves with every variety of exercise in the summer are taking to fencing as a substitute in the winter.

A Stinging Rebuke.

A sensation was caused in one of the eastside churches last Sunday by the severe punishment meted out to a man and woman, apparently husband an wife, who were detected by the pastor in the act of whispering. "The services will not proceed till that man and woman in the second seat leave the church," said the irate pastor. Everybody was painfully surprised and the couple referred to were almost overwhelmed with shame. The pastor roughly remonstrated with them and repeated his command and the couple left the place, the woman in almost a fainting condition.—Buffalo Express.

FOR THE BRIDAL TRIP.

Some Hints Upon Costume Which Brides-to-be May Profit By.

Nowadays the travelling costume is a noticeable garment. It is not possible for any old dress to be worn and to be worn out in the process of travelling without becoming in a measure remarkable. Pains should be taken in starting to choose a well adapted and comfortably fitting one; the skirt the exact length convenient for walking, dimensions only sufficiently ample to hang well, color that does not show dust quickly, and a shade that does not perpetually attract observation. Weight at the hem of a skirt, heavy foundations, etc., add much to fatigue in walking excursions. It is surprising how such trifles studied in the making of a dress will prove a pleasure to the wearer or the contrary. For the contemplated trip a dress such as is worn at home in spring will do. A light tweed or homespun covert jacket, which admits of being worn, if desired, without bodice of dress, out with shirt fronts or loose drapery. A variety of blouses take little room and give a different appearance to the costume. A second morning dress will be necessary, and a stylish one for table d'hote. Black always looks well. A long cloak of alpaca is convenient either for night journeys in railways, or to act as a dust cloak. A couple of pairs of comfortable and serviceable soled boots for walking, and a good supply of stockings.—The Queen.

Canadian Atlantic Service.

Canadians are not badly served by their ocean steamers. The last voyage of the mail steamer Parisian, for instance, was a noteworthy one. The English mails which she brought reached Montreal at 10 o'clock on Friday night last, bringing English letters and journals of 17th to that city in eight days thereafter. Such a rate of speed, if regularly maintained, would leave little to be desired. The cabin passengers on the same trip were landed at Montreal from the steamer at 5 p.m. on the Saturday; their baggage was landed and those of them who were going west were enabled to catch the train that night.—Monetary Times.

Style.

The most fashionable color, at present, is the hue of health, and it will never go out of style. Its shades and tints are various, but all of them are exceedingly becoming. It is perfectly astonishing what a change is being daily wrought by Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription in the looks of sickly women. Sufferers from any sort of "female weakness" or irregularity, backache or nervous prostration should give it a trial. All druggists.

Catarrh is not simply an inconvenience, unpleasant to the sufferer and disgusting to others—it is an advanced outpost of approaching disease of worse type. Do not neglect its warning; it brings deadly evils in its train. Before it is too late, use Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. It reaches the seat of the ailment, and is the only thing that will. You may dose yourself with quack medicines 'till it is too late—'till the streamlet becomes a resistless torrent. It is the matured invention of a scientific physician. The results of English researches in Assyria the past year are said to be very valuable. LIQUOR AND MURDER.

Another terrible drink tragedy has occurred in Toronto. Thos. Kane, a laborer, murdered his wife on Saturday night while under the drink frenzy, and the coroner's jury have returned a verdict of wilful murder against the unfortunate man. Should he hang it will only be another evidence of the terrible inconsistency of the British law which allows the sale of a crazing fluid and then hangs a man for his unwitting act while deranged under its influence. If any extenuating argument can be brought forward in the case of a man who commits murder while laboring under a temporary fit of insanity, we think the same argument has a double force when applied to the one who is crazed through drink at the hands of a second party, backed by governmental authority. The Harvey and Kane cases will be worthy the attention of any person who considers that British law and justice are above reproach. At the peril of being termed a radical we claim that the government which authorizes the wholesale dishing out of "liquid damnation" is equally responsible in the acts which result directly therefrom. This is straight from the shoulder, and we mean what we say. Drunkenness should be made a crime and liable to heavy punishment. The law which applies to the sale of liquors to Indians should be made applicable as well to every white man under the sun.

There is a lot of maudlin sentimentality being exhibited just now for the man Harvey, found guilty and sentenced to be hanged at Guelph for the murder of his wife and two daughters. The trial was a fair one, and Harvey's counsel made a brave fight for his client, leaving no stone unturned to secure his acquital. The plea put forward was that of insanity, but there was no evidence to substantiate the plea, and therefore the judge sentenced the murderer to be hanged. Now a lot of the latter's friends pass around a petition to have his sentence commuted, claiming insanity as the ground for such action. The argument is that he must have been insane at the time when he committed so awful a deed. Of course the same individuals would scarcely hold that a man who committed a theft, or arson, was insane in a lesser degree at the moment such deed was committed! It was made evident to the majority of the people that Harvey committed the deed through nothing but vanity. He was afraid to let his family know that he was not the immaculate being they fondly believed. Perhaps it was an insane vanity, just as was Oscar Wilde's or Beau Brummel's with the consequences more terrible than in either of those cases, but The Advance does not think it should be made a palliating excuse, and should Harvey be pardoned it will be without our consent. All the same we expect nothing else but to hear that his pardon has been secured.

Brazil has given her King, Dom Pedro, the grand bounce, and formed the country into a republic. This has been anticipated for some time, and was precipitated by Princess Isabell, who, during her Pa's absence, signed a proclamation emancipating the slaves. This act was highly applauded by the lower classes and the slaves themselves, but upper-tendom could not stand it and immediately dumped Dom Pedro into the soup. Dom retires on a good income, however, and his daughter will not suffer to any appreciable extent for a marriage portion.

A Few Queries.

To the Editor of The Advance.

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—I live, as you know, some distance from the hub of our township, Artemesia. Your excellent paper brings me the weekly news from all quarters, and it is a very welcome visitor. In busy seasons of the year we have no other news but rumors, and they must always be taken with a grain of salt, Biddy says. But I say rumors cannot start on nothing.

As the time is drawing near for the election of our councillors, or Township Fathers, rumor has been busy with them of late, and to set matters right, and that I may be posted and can contradict rumor if not correct, I will ask you a few questions. I know you can answer them fine.

1st There is a place somewhere between Flesherton and Kimberley called the Valley Road. Did the council spend a large amount of money a couple of years ago on this road, and after they had expended this money, never made it passable for teams, and now the bridges built are nothing, and the way is growing up with trees again? Biddy says it must be like the Valley of Death. If a traveller goes that way he never returneth (that way.) Whose money was put in this road? Rumor says that it is Dr. Christoe's, but I do not believe it. He knows too much to squander his money in that way. It must be the people's money. You will know.

2nd. I understand there has been a couple of large bridges built near Flesherton on the gravel road, and a man was paid for drawing plans and specifications, and to superintend the work, and the work cost $1000 or more, and after the work was passed and the architect paid, within three months more money had to be expended on it to make it safe to travel over. Who was the architect who passed the work. You will know.

Rumor says these expensive works were not completed by contract, but done by piecework, let to friends. If this is so, I am inclined to think the bridge would soon need repair. But this was not the people's money that built these large bridges. Biddy says it is. You will know.

I have a lot more questions to ask you, Mr. Editor, but I will wait for an answer to those and ask a few more then, so that I will not know too much at once. PATRICK.

Priceville.

From our own Correspondent.

The fair on Monday was very well represented by both bipeds and quadrupeds, but the former were in the majority and about two-thirds of the latter were transferred to other hands for the sum of $500, or of an average of nearly $5 per foot,—tails gratis. Some of the public school readers of The Advance can solve the question during the week, how many heads were sold.

Divers nationalities were represented here on fair day as usual, English, Irish, Scotch, German, besides all the mixtures, or grades. Among the most prominent Englishmen on the ground was the formidable tax collector for the adjoining wards of Artemesia and Glenelg.

One of the able representives of Erin was our feiend Mr. J. Best, of Tyrone, who always enlivens the fair ground with his ready sallies of Irish wit.

As to the Scotchmen, I can't particularize, for they were like the sands of the sea shore.

It was arranged at the Presbytery in Orangeville last week, that the Rev. D. McLeod will again take charge of the congregation here.

A few days ago a number of fowl were stolen from the North Line. The feathere were shortly afterwards found buried in a bank of saw dust. Suspicion points the finger severely at a married, and one or two single men of our village. One of the modes of reformation proposed by the "committee" is, by the aid of a can or two of tar, to place carefully all the stolen feathers on the backs of the thieves, but boys be careful!

The literary infant "Vidi" is missing. We hope Oben has not abducted the youngster in order to make the "christening," (or perhaps we should say baptism.)

Cold in Head CATARRH THE 4 STAGES Consumption DEATH.

There is positive danger to health and life in neglecting a case of Cold in the Head or Catarrh, and at this season with its changeable weather, unusual moisture and sudden changes from heat to cold, there is peculiar liability to cold in the head. A neglected case of Cold in the Head rapidly develops into Catarrh, and neglected Catarrh just as certainly develops into Consumption and leads to premature Death. Medical testimony proves conclusively that a large percentage of all the deaths occurring from Consumption had their origin in a neglected Cold, which, by gradual stages, developed into Catarrh, and then into Consumption, that dread disease with which medical science is as yet unable to cope successfully. If you are suffering from Cold in the head or from any of the numerous symptoms of Catarrh, such as bad breath, dull oppressive headaches, droppings from the head into the throat, hawking and spitting, copious discharges from the nostrils, losing sense of smell, or taste becoming dull, hacking cough, or a general feeling of debility, husky voice, a wheezing or cracking sound in your chest when breathing, a feeling of dizziness, particularly when stooping, a feeling of tiredness and indisposition to exertion, a feeling of nausea in the morning when attempting to dislode accumulations in the throat. Do not neglect them. These are but a few of the many symptoms of Catarrh, and if you experience any, BE WARNED IN TIME. Do not permit them to run under the mistaken impression that the disease will eventually wear away. It will not but on the contrary will wear you away as it has thousands before. Procure at once a bottle of NASAL BALM, the only certain and speedy cure ever offered the public for Cold in the Head or Catarrh. This is no idle assertion, but an unquestionable fact, which is verified by the thousands of testimonials in our possession telling of marvelous cures. These testimonials we have received from all parts of the Dominion, and we append a few, selected at random, as a fair sample of the whole:—

Mr. Alex Burns, of Sudbury, Ont., says:—Gents, I may state that I have been affected with Catarrh for seven or eight years, and it was attended with consequent symptoms such as foul breath, constant dropping into the throat, hawking and spitting, partial deafness, ringing in the ears, and sickening pain in the head directly over either eye. I have used powder and douches, but all to no effect. The only result arising from the use of such was temporary relief, followed by the usual symptoms in a more aggravated form. The results arising from the use of Nasal Balm are sweet breath, stoppage of the droppings into the throat (consequently less hawking and spitting), clearness of hearing, and not once since I began its use have I had pain in the head. In fact it is my opinion that a careful and persistent use of the "Balm" will effect a cure in the worst case of catarrh.

James H. McLeod, Mink River Road, N.S., says:—I have tried other remedies for Catarrh, but received little or no good from them. Your NASAL BALM is certainly the BEST REMEDY I have tried, and all you claim for it. The Fact that it is pleasant and convenient to use adds greatly to its value, but its chief worth lies in being a CERTAIN CURE for that unpleasant disease—Catarrh.

W. Chas. Hanley, postmaster, Spry Bay, N.S., says:—I submit the following to the public that any who may be afflicted may be benefitted by the same remedy. Two bottles of your NASAL BALM has RESTORED TO PERFECT HEALTH a four year old child of ours, suffering from Catarrh.

Henrietta Blackwall, Parker, Ont., says:—Your NASAL BALM is the BEST REMEDY I have yet used for Catarrh. I can breathe more freely than before and my breath has regained its sweetness. I consider NASAL BALM a boon to the suffering.

Miss Maggie M. Martin, Terwood, Pa., says:—Through a friend in Canada I became acquainted with your NASAL BALM. I have suffered for years with Catarrh, and it is the first remedy from which I have experienced relief, and I feel certain that it will cure me.

Miss Minnie McNairn, Mille Roches, Ont., says:—Your bottle of NASAL BALM did me much good. The pain in my head disappeared before I had used the bottle, and I find myself receiving the greatest benefit. I am certain NASAL BALM will cure my Catarrh if its use is persevered in.

Mr. John H. Adams, merchant, Brantford, Ont, says:—I have used NASAL BALM for Catarrh and found it to be a certain cure.

W. A. Doyle, Beulah, Man., writes:—As a family medicine to check Catarrhal affections or Cold in the Head, NASAL BALM has no equal. We prise it highly.

Mr. A. Schlenzig, Toronto, says:—For a number of years my wife has been badly troubled with Catarrh. Dr.——— here promised to cure her, but after using his remedy for six months she became worse and weaker than before, and I found that I had spent $36 for medical treatment that did no good. My wife then began to use your NASAL BALM and has improved wonderfully and she is better and stronger than for years. Your remedy is the best in the market and you can use this as testimony.

Emilie Pellitier, Grenville, says:—I can scarcely find words to tell you how highly I prize NASAL BALM. Its effects in my case have been wonderful

Alpha H. Dales, Tarbert Ont., writes:—Your NASAL BALM has made a new man of me. I have never used a remedy so satisfactory.

A CAUTION:—Beware of imitations. If your dealer has not NASAL BALM in stock do not let him persuade you to take any other remedy which he may say is just as good, but send direct to the undersigned and it will be sent you on receipt of price—50 cents and $1.00 a bottle.

The Markdale Standard says: "The crankiness of the editor of the Flesherton Advance is being increased by culture." Glad you recognize the fact. We once heard Bob Burdette say that it was the happiest moment of his life when he was dubbed a crank. You see when the crank turns, all the machinery connected therewith has got to move on or burst. The crank is moving, Br'er Rutledge, and you're bound to hear its buzz.

Last week's Thornbury standard has another three-quarter column article on The Advance and the markets, in which it says that Flesherton's roller mill is run part of the time by steam and part of the time by water. Image of George Washington! but isn't that paper a jewel! Take a trot up this way some day, Mr. Standard, and have your ignorance polished up. We doubt if the Standard man knows what a steam grist-mill is—or any other kind of mill for that matter—judging by the incoherent chat which he indulges in.

The Beeton World tells of an elopement in the following sad, wish-it-was-me language: It was the night before Thanksgiving, Pale Luna had not shed her silvery light over the concessions and sidelines of West Gwillimbury, as the farm clock struck the hour of seven. All was quite in the village and on the homestead the only visible figures were a father and a visitor stabling the latter's horses. Indoors there was on sign of anything unusual going to happen. With no feverish haste but with deliberate step a female figure glode silently upstairs, secured her millinery and walked down the lane. In the village meanwhile, another had been busy and with horse and chariot Romeo was at the trysting place. Juliet tripped gaily down the lane, sprang into the carriage and was rapidly whirled Bond Headwards. No irate father pursued the pair, because the i. f. had not been hit with a hint that such a motion would be brought forward. Thus one feature of every well ordered elopement was omitted. At Bond Head the knot was tied by Rev. Mr. Savage and the bride sought her downy couch in her new home. All that remains to complete the drama is for the happy couple to repair to the domicile of the wife's father and receive his "bless you my children," which as a sensible man he will not withold. The eloping pair are popular in the section and every one wishes them a happy future.

Ten Nights in a Bar Room

The rehearsing for this drama is proceeding with much fervor and great success. It will be the entertainment of the season. New and costly scenery is being prepared for the occasion, and it is intended that the play will be put upon the boards in the best possible style. The characters all fit into their respective niches to perfection. December 10 is the date set for the entertainment.

To Our Subscribers.

The special announcement which appeared in our columns some time since, announcing a special arrangement with Dr. B. J. Kendall Co., of Enosburgh Falls, Vt., publishers of "A Treatise on the Horse and his Diseases," whereby our subscribers were enabled to obtain a copy of that valuable work free by sending their address to B. J. Kendall Co. (and enclosing a two-cent stamp for mailing same) is renewed for a limited period. We trust all will avail themselves of this opportunity of obtaining this valuable work. To every lover of the Horse it is indispensable, as it treats in a simple manner all the diseases which afflict this noble animal. Its phenominal sale throughout the United States and Canada, make it standard authority. Mention this paper when sending for treatise.

A Course of Lectures for $1.75.

A Notable Gathering of the world's leaders comes before the readers of the Youth's Companion during the year 1890. It is like a great Lecture Course of 52 weeks, with over 100 lectures, each a famous authority in some branch of Art, Literature, State-craft, Science or Education. And these lectures cost only 3½ cents each, on the basis of a year's subscription, or 52 numbers for only $1.75. Is it not worth 3½ cents to have Gladstone address you for half an hour? Or to listen for an equal time to Tyndall on the wonders of Nature? And it is just such great men, following each other in rapid succession each week, and discussing every instructive and entertaining topic of the day, who speak to you through the medium of their paper—The Youth's Companion. 430,000 families attend this great Lecture course. You can attend it by reading The Youth's Companion each week. It will be sent you regularly until January 1, 1891, at a cost of only $1.75. Send for Illustrated Prospectus of the entire series to The Youth's Companion, Boston, Mass.

A TERRIBLE WRECK.

Twenty Cars and an Engine Destroyed.

One of the most costly wreckages which the C. P. R. company have ever sustained occurred about seven miles south of Flesherton on Tuesday evening. The circumstances of the accident are as follows:

Way freight No 63, coming north, had occasion to shunt two cars at McQuay's mill, one mile below Proton station. In doing this one of the cars—a flat car—broke loose and ran down a grade, colliding with the engine and breaking in two. This caused considerable delay, and a man was sent back to flag a special freight which was following. Whether the engineer saw the flag or not we could not learn, but the fact remains that the special came rushing along around a grade and the engineer was unable to stop his train before it smashed into the caboose of No 63. Immediately before the two trains came together the fireman, engineer and first brakesman of the special jumped for their lives and miraculously escaped with nothing more than a severe shaking. The scene of the accident was immediately opposite McQuay's sawmill, and Mr. McQuay, who was standing in his door and viewed the whole occurrence, describes it as one of the most awful sights which he ever witnessed.

On Wednesday when The Advance viewed the wreckage, a terrible scene of desolation was presented. Cars were heaped in terrible confusion, broken into shapeless masses; the engine of the special lay upon its back down the embankment, at this point about twelve feet high; remnants of dry goods, groceries, hardware, car wheels, and steel rails bent and twisted, lay in endless confusion. At one point lying directly across the track was a car loaded with car wheels, the car itself bent and broken into a million pieces. One car which had not left the roadbed had protruding through its roof the top of another car into which it had telescoped. For rods the roadbed itself was plowed up and levelled, leaving not a vestige of track or ties to be seen. After the collision a portion of the wreckage in the vicinity of the engine took fire, and when we visited it the engine and tender were a mass of burned iron, with no woodwork to be seen. Since seven o'clock Tuesday night—the time of the accident — up to the time of writing, through traffic has been entirely suspended, excepting by transfer of passengers and mails. Gangs of men are at work, however, and it is expected that the track will be cleared and traffic resumed by to morrow (Thursday.) It is a terribly costly wreckage, and the damage cannot be estimated as yet. At least twenty cars were demolished, besides the engine and tender, and a large quantity of freight destroyed. The special was loaded with heavy freight, such as car wheels, fish plates, and other iron merchandise, which fact was given as an explanation of the engineer's inability to stop his train in time. Large numbers of visitors viewed the scene of disaster on Wednesday.

THE CRONIN TRIAL.

O'Sullivan's Admissions Come Up in Evidence Against Him.

REPORTED ARREST OF COONEY.

A Chicago special of Thursday says: The Cronin trial was continued to-day. Coroner Hertz, who held the inquest on the body of Dr. Cronin, was examined. He identified the trunk in which Cronin's body had been packed. William Mertes, a milkman, testified that he saw Kunze and Coughlin drive up to the Carlson cottage on the evening of May 4th last, and saw Coughlin enter the cottage. Kunze drove away.

O'SULLIVAN'S STORY HURTS HIS CASE.

Police Captain Schaack testified about his conversations with P. O'Sullivan, the ice-man, after the murder. O'Sullivan refused to give the names of the members of the Irish National Brotherhood, who attended the meeting at which O'Sullivan made Dr. Cronin's acquaintance. The witness went over the story as told by O'Sullivan of the contract with Cronin about attending O'Sullivan's icemen. O'Sullivan admitted he had never had an accident to one of his men, and the captain's questions were intended to get an admission that it was unreasonable that under such circumstances he would pay $50 for the ice season, which he said were the terms agreed on. O'Sullivan, however, insisted he thought it a good thing to do. O'Sullivan admitted after some hesitation that Coughlin telephoned to him in April, but said it was about getting ice. He first denied that he had telephoned to Coughlin, but subsequently admitted he had talked to Coughlin about Kunze. O'Sullivan the Captain said, at first denied that he had been out of his office on the night of May 4th after 7 30 o'clock, but afterwards admitted he had been out. He said he was in the rear of the sheds, but no further. It was in relation to a horse O'Sullivan said that he wanted to ask Coughlin.

Chief of Police Hubbard testified to taking possession of the bloody trunk. H identified the trunk and also identified Burke as the man brought from Winnipeg under his supervision.

On cross-examination an attempt was made to get the witness to give details of an interview he had with Coughlin several weeks after the murder. Objection was made by the prosecution which was sustained by the court.

Acting Police Captain Schuettler identified a section of the flooring of the Carlson cottage, on which there were footprints in the paint.

IS IT COONEY, "THE FOX"?

Chief Hubbard received a telegram to-day from Sparta, Wisconsin, saying that a man closely answering the description of Patrick Cooney, "The Fox,' the fugitive Cronin suspect, had been arrested in the woods, where he had been living on berries and wild fruits. He will be held to await the arrival of Cooney's picture.

MERTES' EVIDENCE IMPORTANT.

The positive identification of Burke as the tenant of the Carlson cottage was outdone to-day by the startling story of Wm. Mertes, a milkman living in the neighborhood of the murder. In the cause of justice and the vindication of the law it was providential that this citizen should have been within a dozen feet of the Carlson cottage when Coughlin and Kunze drove up to the slaughter-house half an hour before their victim arrived. Mertes convinced the jury by his positiveness that he saw Coughlin leap from the buggy, run up the steps and let himself into the cottage, and that Kunze was the companion of the detective. The little German acted as driver, and when Coughlin alighted he turned the horse quickly around and drove back towards the city. The inevitable conclusion to be drawn by the jury from this story is that Coughlin assisted in the butchery, if they believe the cottage was the scene of the murder, but there is a reasonable doubt at present whether Kunze had a guilty knowledge of the tragedy which was to be enacted within half an hour after he arrived at the cottage. The milkman unintentionally infused some humor into his story, and amused the audience by his candid admission that he had lied to Judge Wing when the lawyer for the defence called at the witness' house to find out what he would testify, and Judge Wing was very angry and savage in his cross-examination when he found out how he had been deceived, but the witness, though ignorant of much English, held his ground and would not be intimidated.

As the case now stands the State can reasonably expect a conviction of Burke, O'Sullivan, Coughlin, and possibly Kunze. The defence will not try to impeach any of the evidence, as in the Anarchist trial, and their case will necessarily be a weak one.

A Chicago despatch of Friday says: In the Cronin case to-day Police Captains Schenkler and Wing and several others gave testimony which contained nothing new of importance.

Wm. Nieman, who at the time of the murder kept a saloon not far from the Carlson cottage, then testified that O'Sullivan entered his saloon between 10 and 11 o'clock on the night of the murder. He was accompanied by two men. The witness was reluctant to say whether either of the two was one of the defendants in this case, but finally said he thought Coughlin was one of the men. The other could not speak English plainly. He had a slight German accent. Witness thought this was Kunze. The three stood close together and talked in under tones for twenty minutes.

AN IMPORTANT FIND.

The sensation in connection with the Cronin case to-day was the finding of the surgical case and clothes of the murdered physician, and the forging of another link in the chain of circumstantial evidence that clanks around the conspirators. For some time complaints have been made to the sewer department of the Lakewood station that the sewer at the intersection of Evanston and Buena avennes was flush and running over. To-day two or three sewer cleaners were detailed to investigate the trouble. The cover was removed from the manhole in the centre of the street, and with long poles the workmen prodded among the rubbish beneath the water. Finally a solid substance was encountered, and the workmen then realized that something more than alluvial deposit was causing the trouble. After some hooking and digging two valises were unearthed, one a leather one, and the other the remnants of a paper one. In the leather valise was found Dr. Cronin's prescription book, with several prescriptions bearing his signature. The paper one dropped to pieces as it was pulled out, and from it rolled a mass of tattered clothing that bore evidence of having been cut in strips with a knife. The only intact garment was the vest, which was in the centre, and which encircled the doctor's case of surgical instruments. The clothing had evidently been cut and the buttons removed in the hope that they would the sooner drop apart and be borne away by the water into the lake. The surgical case and prescription-book bore the doctor's name, and they as well as every article of outward clothing were recognized by the Conklins and a dozen other friends as the property of the murdered physician. The most damning of all circumstances for the prisoners is the fact that all this was found only one block from the spot where the bloody trunk was discovered after it had been thrown from the waggon on the night of May 4th, or only half a mile south from where the body of Dr. Cronin was found in the catch-basin. The paper valise is supposed to be the one purchased by "S. B. Simmonds" from A H. Revelle & Co., and a clerk from that establishment will endeavor to identify the remains.

A TRAGEDY NOT ON THE BILL.

A tragic event which occurred just in front of the court house while everybody was examining these articles caused the wildest excitement. A shot was heard just at the entrance of Judge McConnell's court The State Attorney and a dozen lawyers and reporters rushed from the State Attorney's office into the street. Stretched lengthwise on the sidewalk was a strong man with a smoking revolver in his hand and brains oozing from his skull. He was quite dead, and as no one could identify him it was at once presumed that his tragic death had some mysterious connection with the sensational discoveries of the day. After an hour's investigation by the State's officer, however, it was ascertained that his name was Edward Rhem, and that he had been for some time partially insane. He doubtless committed suicide while laboring under mental aberration.

SULLIVAN'S BONDS.

Attorney Gilbert this morning made application in Judge Baker's Court for the release of Alex. Sullivan from the bail bond of $25,000 given by him last June. Mr. Gilbert said he asked for the discharge of his client for the reason that the grand jury, after a long investigation, had failed to return any indictment against Mr. Sullivan. Upon the recommendation of the coroner's jury he had been held to await the action of the grand jury. Several grand juries had met since that time, but no return of the indictment had been made against Sullivan, and therefore he asked for his discharge.

"The State of course resists that motion," said Mr. Elliott. "The matter is pending before the grand jury now, and is still undisposed of."

SISTER CATHARINE

Is the Religious Name of Millionaire Drexel's Daughter.

A Pittsburg despatch of Thursday says: Archbishop Ryan, of Philadelphia, has arrived here to assist in the ceremonies of receiving Miss Kate Drexel, daughter of F. A. Drexel, the millionaire banker of Philadelphia, into the new convent of St Mary of Mercy. The reception took place to day. A large number of friends and relatives from Philadelphia were present. Miss Drexel's spiritual adviser, Right Rev. Jas. O'Connor, Bishop of Omaha, has made the journey from Nebraska to this city to be present at the ceremony, which was conducted by Right Rev. Bishop Phelan, Bishop of the Diocese of Pittsburg. Although Miss Drexel at first refused to wear the white gown and orange blossoms of the bride, she finally consented to attire herself in a beautiful white satin dress. There was no display at the reception. The ceremonies were conducted as quietly and as unostentatiously as possible. The novice has made a special request that all pomp and splendor be dispensed with. Her first assignment will probably be as a nurse in Mercy Hospital on Stevenson street. She will be known as Sister Catharine.

A Lynching Postponed.

A Danville, Va., despatch of Thursday says: Some excitement was caused here to-day by a rumor that a party from South Boston would come to Danville to-night and lynch three negroes in jail here charged with being members of the gang who fired from ambush at Hon. R. R. Noblin and other white men on Tuesday night. The Mayor ordered out the militia and the jail is well guarded. The prisoners will be protected at all hazards. The prisoners have confessed they were with the mob and heard them make their plans, but deny that they took part in the shooting. The ringleader has not been arrested.

Natural Gas a Commercial Commodity.

An Indianapolis despatch says: For the first time in the history of natural gas its commercial standing has been fixed by a court of appellate jurisdiction. To-day the Supreme Court handed down a decision which holds that natural gas may become a commercial commodity, and that the State Legislature cannot enact any law regulating commerce between the States, therefore the Legislative Act of last winter, prohibiting the piping of gas out of the State, is unconstitutional. The law was passed to prevent the Chicago Gas Trust from piping gas to Chicago.

A Diamond Robbery.

A Louisville despatch of Tuesday says Mrs. H. E. Harris this morning took from a jewellery store a pair of diamond earrings and a finger ring, which she had left to be repaired. A well-dressed man saw her receive the diamonds, and followed her until she reached an alley, when he snatched the pocketbook from her hands and escaped up the alley. The robbery was witnessed by a number of persons.

AN ELECTRIC WIRE.

Roasts a Horse, Throws the Driver out and Knocks a Sergeant Senseless.

A New York despatch says An electri light current yesterday morning roasted a horse to death, threw the driver to the stree and knocked a police sergeant senseless. The deadly current was carried to its victims through a telephone wire. A pole carrying numberless wires stands on Fourth avenue near the corner of Twenty-eighth street. About 4 o'clock in the morning one of the wires, a telephone line, fell to the street, and formed a loop across the down track of the Fourth Avenue Railroad Soon after it fell Thomas Whelan, driver of a Herald delivery wagon came along. The horse instantly came to a halt and then sprang aside and fell. The jolt of the vehicle threw Whelan to the street, and when he arose he received a shock which threw him prostrate to the gutter. Regaining his feet the driver undertook to raise the horse but as soon as he touched the animal another shock passed through him. He then comprehended the cause and lay still. Citizens attracted to the scene noticed flashes of blue flame emanating from the prostrate animal. The flashes came from all parts of the horse's body and the smell of burning flesh was perceptible half a block away. Whelan was assisted to his feet, but the horse was given a wide berth. One man ran to the Thirty-fifth street police station and reported the matter, and Sergeant Albert Macdonald and Roundsman Thomas Cassidy hurried to the scene. They saw the horse still emitting sparks, and calling out the reserves a guard was established at points sufficiently far from the roasting animal to warn all wayfarers away from the fatal spot. Sergeant Macdonald undertook to find the deadly wire, and in making a turn around the waggon came in contact with it in the darkness. The wire struck him in the forehead and he fell to the pavement senseless, as though he had been shot. Roundsman Cassidy went to the rescue of his stricken comrade, and when he caught hold of the Sergeant's leg he received a shock which compelled him to release his hold. A second effort was more successful, and soon after being carried to the sidewalk the Sergeant slowly recovered his senses. His head was covered with blood, and above his brow was the imprint of the wire, while beside it was a gash, evidently occasioned by the fall. He was dazed and helpless, so that he was obliged to go home. About 5 o'clock, up to which time the horse continued to roast slowly, it occurred to some one to send to the Manhattan Electric Light Company's shop in West Twenty-fifth street. Foreman Knight and two linemen visited the scene, wearing rubber boots and gloves, and found the deadly wire, on the end of which the horse's body lay. They pulled it down from the pole, and travel was resumed after the horse had been dragged off the tracks. A deep furrow was burned in the animal's back. Efforts made to find the point where the wire crossed the electric transmitter were of no avail.

THE BALTIC OUTRAGE.

Chief Justice Armour States the Law to an Owen Sound Jury.

An Owen Sound despatch says: At 10 o'clock sharp His Lordship Chief Justice Armour ascended the bench and the fall sittings of the Assize Court for this county commenced. Both the criminal and civil sides are heavy, and it is likely the sittings will be of considerable duration. Owing to the fact that the Baltic case comes up for trial at this session of the Court, more than usual interest is taken in the proceedings by the general public. While His Lordship was delivering his address to the Grand Jury the Court room was crowded, In the course of his address the learned Judge dwelt at considerable length on the Baltic case, pointing out that unless the death was the direct result of the ill-treatment received, or that the deceased came to his death by jumping overboard owing to fear of further violence, a true bill for murder or manslaughter should not be found. If the Grand Jury thought the boy took his life from shame and mortification, a bill for aggravated assult should be returned.

The Baltic Prisoners Acquitted.

The trial of the prisoners implicated in what is known as the Baltic outrage took place at Owen Sound yesterday. It was shown that the unfortunate boy Hambly had been tarred and feathered by the prisoners, and that in an excess of shame he had thrown himself overboard and was drowned, but on a technical point (that the drowning of the boy could not be proved to be the result of the outrage), the prisoners were acquitted of manslaughter; but two of them pleaded guilty to assault, on which charge they will be sentenced to-day.

A FATHER'S AWFUL CRIME.

A Tragedy That Eclipses the Guelph Murders.

A Grand Rapids, Mich., despatch says: A tragedy unequaled in the criminal annals of Kent county was enacted in Vergennes township, about twenty miles east of this city, at 4 o'clock yesterday morning. Haggai Westbrook, heretofore an industrious and prosperous farmer, did his best to exterminate his entire family, slaughtering his three young daughters, probably mortally wounding his wife, seriously though not fatally hurting his son, and then closing the carnival of blood by cutting his own throat from ear to ear with an old razor. Westbrook lived with his family on a fine farm of 160 well-improved and highly productive acres, and had the respect and esteem of all his neighbors. A few months ago by bad business management he suffered financial losses, which, it is supposed, preyed on his mind to such an extent as to affect his brain. Insanity is the only explanation for the tragedy of this morning.

The Westbrook family retired at the usual hour Monday night, and nothing strange was noticed in the appearance of the father. Westbrook, with his wife, occupied a room downstairs; their three daughters, ranging in ages from 3 to 14, occupied a room near them, while the son, aged 15 years, occupied a room upstairs. The husband and father arose a few minutes before 4 o'clock yesterday morning, lighted a lamp, dressed himself, and proceeded to the kitchen, where he obtained an ordinary carpenter's hammer. He then went to the bed where his wife was sleeping and struck her three heavy blows on the forehead with the weapon, cracking her skull. He left her unconscious and went to the bedroom where were sleeping his three daughters, one of them a mere babe. He carried the lamp with him and with its light he dealt the three innocents blows similar to those administered on the skull of his wife.

Westbrook then proceeded up-stairs to his son's bedside. He turned the boy upon his back, his face being towards the wall and away from him, and raised his death-dealing hammer. The blow glanced from the young man's forehead, awakening the boy, and just as the second blow was descending to silence him forever he caught the weapon and wrenched it from his father's hand. The insane murderer hastened down stairs and the son followed. Upon reaching the foot of the stairs the boy heard groans coming from his mother's room, and when he had gone to her side and made the awful discovery that she had been one of the victims he rushed out doors to ring the farm bell and alarm the neighbors. In going through the kitchen he discovered his father outstretched dead upon the floor. Westbrook, after failing to kill his son, had cut his own throat, and must have died instantly.

The baby died within a few hours. Another daughter died this afternoon, and no hopes are entertained for the recovery of the third. The mother is still alive, but is in a precarious condition, with her skull fractured. Still there is a possibility of her survival. The son alone of all the family escaped.

The Lightermen's Strike.

A London cable says: The General Steam Navigation Company has sent a circular to its customers, stating that owing to the lightermen's strike the Company will load at Norwich. At the Master Lightermen's meeting several speakers expressed displeasure because Cardinal Manning and Sidney Buxton sided with the men without inquiring into their demands. Even Lord Brassey's award, it was said, would enable the men to earn £4 4s weekly, the highest artisan wages in the country. Cardinal Manning, Mr. Buxton and the Lord Mayor have sent a letter to the masters, declaring that the principle of one job to constitute a night's work was accepted by the masters and that the matter was not referred to Lord Brassey. They advised the masters to surrender. The lightermen have withdrawn their strike manifesto in the hope of a settlement with the masters.

An Infant State

A Bismarck, N D, despatch of Thursday says: Monday was the last day of the Territorial Government of Dakota. At 3 o'clock the Territorial Governor, Secretary, Auditor and Attorney-General, stepped down and out, and in turn the Bonanza farmer, John Miller, and his staff of officers took their places. The change was made with little or no pomp and ceremony. At the same time Guy Corliss, of Grand Forks, only 31 years of age, became, by the courtesy of his elder colleagues, the First Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of North Dakota. The first act of the new Governor was the promulgation of the proclamation convening the Legislature on Nov. 19th.

Steamboat Explosion.

A Lewes, Del., despatch of Monday says To-day while the fishing steamer S. S Brown was cruising off the New Jersey coast, twenty five miles from the Delaware breakwater, her boilers exploded, killing Fireman John Lecosta, and fatally scalding Chief Engineer Charles Bailey and Assistant Engineer Wm. Ludlow, all from Connecticut. Three deck hands were seriously but not fatally scalded. The steamer Allyne went to the assistance of the Brown, bringing the injured men to the United States Marine Hospital here.

Mahone Says He Didn't Shoot.

A Petersburg, Va., despatch of Wednesday says: At the investigation of the alleged shooting of Herbert Harrison here by Gen. Mahone last night Chas. Romaine testified that the General's son, Butler Mahone, knocked witness down either with his fist or with a revolver. Other witnesses testified that three shots were fired from Mahone's yard and that somebody in the yard shot Harrison.

Fatal Furnace Explosion.

A Lebanon, Pa., despatch of Monday says: By the breaking out of molten iron in the stack of the Coldbrook furnace No. 1, this afternoon, Harvey Bohr, Henry Fortig, Isaac Siegrist, Wm. Snyder and Harvey Beck were killed. John Bohr, Benjamin Eck and Enoch Eisenhaur were severely burned.

COUNTERFEIT BANK BILLS.

A Big Collection of Them in Montreal,

BUT NO DANGER FEARED,

Because They Are Owned by a Gentleman Who is There to Protect the Public.

There is at present a gentleman in this city who has with him a collection of bank notes. Usually there is nothing peculiar about a gentleman having a collection of bank notes, but there is about this collection. Every note in it is a counterfeit. Some of them are famous. The gentleman in question has no bad designs on a confiding Montreal public. Even if he desired to he could not pass them off as he has taken the trouble to mark "counterfeit" or "bad" on every one of them. The gentleman in question is Mr. J. Fred. Grant, who is connected with Dickerman's United States Counterfeit Detector, a publication which is to be found in all American and Canadian treasury departments, nearly every bank in both countries and in hundreds of counting houses. He is in town on business connected with his publication. Last evening a Gazette reporter ran up against him in the lobby of the Balmoral Hotel and persuaded Mr. Grant after a little trouble to show him his collection.

"To begin with," said Mr. Grant, "the Canadian counterfeits don't amount to a row of pins when compared with the American. In the first place, they are, as a rule,

NOT HALF AS WELL EXECUTED, and there are not nearly so many of them."

"How many Canadian counterfeits are there?"

"There are only thirty-one counterfeits of Canadian banks. This does not include bills of banks in liquidation or that have failed. On the other side we have 106 counterfeits of National bank notes, 61 of United States treasury notes and already 9 of the lately issued silver certificates. Here," said Mr. Grant, going to his valise and taking out a bundle of bank notes, which he spread out upon the table, "are some of your Canadian counterfeits. This is a counterfeit Dominion $2 note, Montreal issue. You can see yourself that it is a very dangerous note. The portrait of Lady Dufferin is not quite up to the mark of the genuine, and the paper is of a yellowish cast. There are also one or two minor defects. It is a good counterfeit, far better than that of the Toronto issue of the same note.

"But here," and Mr. Grant selected a Canadian Bank of Commerce $10 bill, "is the best counterfeit of any Canadian bank in existence. It is an exceedingly hard note to detect. I got that in Montreal to-day."

"Are you finding many counterfeits?"

"Well, no, I haven't tried. If I did I might find a great many counterfeit American notes. Here is a $5 United States silver certificate, check letter A. The portrait of Present Grant is not as good as the original. It was engraved by a fellow countryman of yours named Johnson, who hailed from Toronto. At present he is doing time

IN A MICHIGAN PENITENTIARY."

"What do you thind of that?" and Mr. Grant tossed the reporter what purported to be a $5 Dominion bill.

"Isn't it good?" queried the reporter after he had looked it all over and tried in vain to remember what a $5 bill looked like.

"Hold it up to the light," answered Mr. Grant. The reporter did as requested and then and there made a solemn oath to hold every $5 bill that ever came into his possession up to the light. When it was held up to the light it became painfully apparent that it was worth just $5 less than face value. It was originally a $1 Dominion note. The two ends where the numerals were formerly had been clipped off and replaced with the ends of a $5 bill of some Canadian bank which had gone to the wall without redeeming its notes. The places where the joints had been were carefully smoothed down, leaving no trace until the note was held up to the light.

"Lots of people would be taken in by that note. They would never stop to think that the Dominion Government does not issue $5 bills."

"Whew!" said the reporter, as Mr. Grant threw down on the table a bunch of

A DOZEN $100 BILLS.

"There's a nice little lot," continued Mr. Grant, totally oblivious of the reporter's emotion. "Everyone of them is bad. That counterfeit is one of the most famous in the world, They are some of the Brockway notes. Never heard of them, eh? Well, lots of Americans wish to-day that they had never heard of them. The plates were engraved by a man named Smith, who also engraved the original note. They are a very good forgery, and show how near a man can come to duplicating his own work. The signatures were forged by a man of the name of Brockway, and it is from him that they take their name. The engraving is beautiful.

"It is a curious fact,' said Mr. Grant, in conclusion, "that I find a very large number of Canadian counterfeits in towns along the border, particularly Detroit and Port Huron. I don't understand it. Do you?"

A query the reporter did not answer, for he had left with a greater sense of this world's wickedness. —Montreal Gazette.

About Taking Cold.

When a person begins to shiver, the blood is receding from the surface; congestion, to a greater or less extent, has taken place, and the patient has already taken cold, to be followed by fever, inflammation of the lungs, neuralgia, rheumatism, etc. All these evils can be avoided and the cold expelled by walking, or in some exercise that will produce a prompt and decided reaction in the system. The exercise should be sufficient to produce perspiration. If you are so situated that you can get a glass of hot water to drink, it will materially aid the perspiration, and in every way assist nature in her efforts to remove the cold. This course followed your cold is at an end, and whatever disease it would ultimate in is avoided; your sufferings are prevented and your doctor's bills saved.—Periscope.

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

A Contemporary Poet Whose Works Will Survive Our Time.

His Epigrammatic Wit—Philosophy in the Garb of Dialect—A Born Reformer—One Whose Heart is Right.

The poetry of our language has been enriched not a little by the productions of that versatile bard James Russell Lowell, who now spends the declining years of his life at his lovely home, "Elmwood," at Cambridge, Mass. Perhaps his "Bigelow Papers" have done most to popularize him, in America, but meritorious as they are he has left numerous other works which will endear his memory to posterity when, the special circumstances and occurrences at which the "Bigelow Papers" were directed being but a reminiscence, they will cease to exercise the force they do on the minds of the present generation, many of whom were on the scene when the curse of legalized chattel slavery was wiped out of America. His is not the poetry that dies with the poet.

He was born at Cambridge, Mass., on February 22nd, 1819, studied law and was in his twenty-first year admitted to the bar. The work was uncongenial, although there are not lacking in his works evidences that he derived benefit from the course of study, and he soon abandoned it and turned his attention to literature. In 1841—when he was 22 years of age—his first published work, "A Year's Life," was given to the public. In the following year "A Legend of Brittany, and other Poems," appeared and did not fail to attract attention and evoke criticism. Since that time his name has been more or less prominently before the world of letters. He engaged with Robert Carter in publishing a magazine called "The Pioneer," but not even the pens of Poe and the gifted elder Hawthorne could aid him to success. In 1845 the first of the series of "Bigelow Papers" and "The Vision of Sir Launfal" appeared and were well received. Everything he wrote at or about that period breathed the spirit of the abolitionist. Into that movement he put his whole heart and influence, often to his own great personal discomfort and disadvantage. He cared not how great was the odds against him, always exemplifying his belief that > "They are slaves who dare not be > In the right with two or three."

"From 1857 to 1862 he edited the "Atlantic Monthly," and from 1863 to 1872, in company with Charles Norton, he edited the "North American Review." His country honored him by appointing him Minister to Spain and, subsequently, to England, in both of which countries he gained an enviable popularity. It can scarcely be said that he was a brilliant diplomatist—indeed occasion never tried his powers—but he never failed to gather friends, and among all who have held the position in either of these countries, none leave behind such a fragrant memory. That he was no parish politician is breathed in his "Fatherland."

> "Where is the true man's fatherland?
> Is it where he by chance is born?
> Doth not the yearning spirit scorn
> In such scant borders to be spanned?
> O yes! His fatherland must be
> As the blue heaven wide and free.
> Where'er a human heart doth wear
> Joy's myrtle-wreath or sorrow's gyves,
> Where'er a human spirit strives
> After a life more true and fair,
> There is the true man's birthplace grand,
> His is a world-wide fatherland."

It would be quite impossible, in a brief sketch, to give anything like representative extracts from his very voluminous works, but a few gems will not fail to show something of his versatility and wide range of mental vision. From his "Present Crisis," a poem of the abolition times, I quote:

"Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide,
In the strife of Truth with Falsehood, for the good or evil side;
Some great cause God's new Messiah, offering each the bloom or blight,
Parts the goats upon the left hand and the sheep upon the right,
And the choice goes by forever 'twixt that darkness and the light.

Then to side with Truth is noble when we share her wretched crust,
Ere her cause bring fame and profit and 'tis prosperous to be just;
Then it is the brave man chooses, while the coward stands aside,
Doubting in his abject spirit, till his Lord is crucified
And the multitude make virtue of the faith they had denied.

For Humanity sweeps onward; where to-day the Martyr stands,
On the morrow crouches Judas with the silver in his hands;
Far in front the cross stands ready and the crackling faggots burn,
While the hooting mob of yesterday is silent awe return
To glean up the scattered ashes into History's golden urn."

Perhaps there may be grander thoughts put into nobler verse and expressing more forcibly a great truth, but I have not met with the particular example. Woman's harshness to the unfortunate of her own sex seems to have forcibly impressed Lowell, and, in his "Legend of Brittany," a beautiful story, after leaving the betrayed girl freezing at the door he administers this stinging rebuke to the "Levites" of the sex:

> Thou wilt not let her wash thy dainty feet
> With such salt things as tears, or with rude hair
> Dry them, soft Pharisee, that sitt'st at meat
> With him who made her such, and speak'st him fair,
> Leaving God's wandering lamb the while to bleat
> Unheeded, shivering in the pitiless air:
> Thou hast made prisoned virtue show more wan
> And haggard than a vice to look upon.

What Scot has ever read his "An Incident in a Railroad Car" without a swelling of the heart? Where was ever more modest or feeling tribute to Scotland's immortal bard than in those quiet verses:

> He spoke of Burns: Men rude and rough
> Pressed round to hear the praise of one
> Whose heart was made of manly, simple stuff,
> As homespun as their own.
>
> And when he read they forward leaned,
> Drinking with thirsty hearts and ears
> His brook-like songs whom glory never weaned
> From humble smiles and tears.
>
> Slowly there grew a tender awe,
> Sun-like, o'er faces brown and hard,
> As if in him who read they felt and saw
> Some presence of the bard.

If there is any Scot, any lover of Burns, or any one who appreciates the charm of poetry of feeling, who has not read the poem I quote from he has my sympathy. Lowell gives Burns a high rank and warm reception in his heart. His "At the Burns Centennial" is also a noble tribute to the great poet; and a proper rebuke to those whose superior righteousness nerves them to sit in judgment upon him is contained in the verse:

> They make religion be abhorred
> Who round with darkness gulf her,
> Who think no word can please the Lord
> Unless it smell of sulphur.
> Dear Poet-heart that childlike guessed
> The Father's loving kindness,
> Come now to rest! Thou didst His best,
> If haply 'twas in blindness.

In his "Anti-Apis" he expresses in a verse a great truth concerning the growth of laws as founded upon our ideas of right and justice, and the hope of improvement ever present amid the blunders natural to humanity.

> But dig down, the old unbury; thou shalt find on every stone
> That each age hath carved the symbol of what god to them was known.
> Ugly shapes and brutish sometimes, but the fairest that they knew,
> If their sight was dim and earthward, yet their hope and aim were true.

And mark the rebuke that is administered in a succeeding verse:

> Think you Truth a farthing rushlight to be pinched out when you will
> With your deft official fingers and your politician's skill?
> Is your god a wooden fetish, to be hidden out of sight,
> That his block eyes may not see you do the thing that is not right?

Few men with better grace could utter such words, for Lowell has been preeminently a man having the courage of his convictions, and as such he is universally respected. Criticism he has had and of the most biased and unjust kind, when his pen was one of the most active in the advocacy of the abolition of slavery; but his honesty of motive has never been impugned. By the way, his "Fable for Critics" is a most interesting production—a real work of genius, whether viewed as a poem or merely as a jingling rhyme, but which space forbids further reference to here. But a glance at his "Bigelow Papers." How is this for dialect philosophy?

> Ez fer war, I call it murder—
> There you hev it plain an' flat;
> I don't want to go no furder
> Than my testyment fer that;
> God hez sed so plump an' fairly,
> It's ez long ez it is broad,
> An' you've got to git up airly
> If you want to take in God.
>
> 'Taint your eppyletts an' feathers
> Make the thing a grain more right;
> 'Taint afollerin' your bell wethers
> Will excuse ye in His sight;
> Ef you take a sword an' dror it,
> An' go stick a feller thru,
> Guv'ment aint to answer for it,
> God 'll send the bill to you.
>
> I dunno but what it's pooty
> Trainin' roun' in bobtail cats—
> But it's curus Christian dooty
> This 'ere cuttin' folks's throats.

And in the same strain he makes our philosophical friend "Birdofreedum Sawin," remark on his Mexican war experiences:

> There's sutthin' gits into my throat that makes it hard to swaller,
> It comes so nateral to think about a hempen collar;
> Its glory—but in spite o' all my tryin' to get callus,
> I feel a kind o' in a cart aridin' to the gallows.

And how correctly he valued much of the current political demagogonery of the age:

> The side of our country must allers be took,
> An' President Polk, you know, he is our country,
> An' the angel that writes all our sins in a book
> Puts the debit to him an' to us the per contry
> . . . . . .
> Wal, its a marcy we've got folks to tell us
> The rights an' the wrongs o' these matters I vow,—
> God sends country lawyers, an' other wise fellers
> To start the world's team when it gits in a slough.
>
> Fer John P
> Robinson he
> Says the world'll go right if he hollers out Gee!

Lowell had had a good deal of experience with "practical politicians" and certainly never were those professionals more lampooned than by him. He had seen that

> Resolves air a thing we most gen'ally keep ill,
> They're a cheap kin' o' dust for the eyes o' the people.

And that so far as the professional politician is concerned

> A marciful providence fashioned us holler
> O' purpose that we might our principles swaller.
> . . . . . .
> Aint principle precious? Then who's going to use it
> Wen there's resk o' some chap's gittin' up to abuse it?

He was early disgusted with the glittering generalities in which some alleged statesman delight ever to deal, and this is how he gets at it:

> I'm willin' a man should go tollable strong
> Agin wrong in the abstract, fer that kind o wrong
> Is allers unpop'lar an' never gets pitied
> Because it's a wrong no one ever committed;
> But he mustn't be hard on pertikler sins
> Cause then he'll be kickin' the people's own shins.

His "Pious Editor's Creed" is a very neat thing of its kind, but I must not pause to quote. The temptation to do so is great but space is limited. In sorrow's moods Lowell's poetry holds the deepest feelings in sway. What mother can read his "After the Burial" unmoved?

> Console if you will, I can bear it;
> 'Tis a well-meant alms of breath;
> But not all the preaching since Adam
> Has made Death other than Death.
>
> Yes, it's pagan; but wait till you feel it,
> That jar of our earth, that dull shock
> When the ploughshare of deeper passion
> Tears down to our primitive rock.
> That little shoe in the corner,
> So worn and wrinkled and brown,
> With its emptiness confutes you,
> And argues your wisdom down.

But for the present I must close a volume from which I have derived not a little pleasure and profit. Versatile beyond many great authors; ever natural; possessing a manly heart and gifted with the true poetic fire, nothing that he has produced will be found profitless. He has not yet ceased to woo the Muse, although he has "warmed both hands at the fire of life," and bids fair to realize

> Happy their end
> Who vanish down life's evening stream
> Placid as swans that drift in dream
> Round the next river bend!
> Happy long life with honor at the close.
> Friend's painless tears, the softened thought of foes!
> And yet like him to spend
> All at a gush, keeping our first faith sure
> From mid-life's doubt and old's contentment poor—
> What more could Fortune send?

Few poets have had such an untroubled life as the slight, spare man, crowned with a wealth of curly gray hair, and with wavy beard, who whiles away the evening of his live in comfort among those who love and revere him in his pleasant home at Cambridge.

TOUCHING INCIDENT.

A Dead Fireman's Child Tries to Wake Him from His Last Sleep.

"What is the matter with my papa?"

Steve Neall's 5-year-old daughter had caught sight of her dead father in his coffin last Friday evening, says the San Francisco Examiner, and asked the question of those who had gathered about the bier.

"Papa is asleep," they told her.

"Why is papa in that ugly box?" she persisted.

"He can sleep better there."

"Good night, papa."

She passed into the adjoining room and was soon asleep.

The mourners sat about the coffin of the dead fireman all night.

Shortly before 1 o'clock in the morning the gong on the wall that had so often summoned him to his duty clanged an alarm for the Polk street fire. It had sounded once and was repeating the alarm when the little girl came flying into the room in her long white nightdress.

She looked at the silent watchers and then ran to the side of the dead man. Climbing on a chair she reached into the coffin and shook her father by the shoulder.

"Papa, papa, wake up!" she cried. "There's a fire! Wake up!"

The looks of the people in the room and the strange silence of her father frightened her.

"Wake up, please, papa," she pleaded, her voice beginning to quiver. "Can't you hear the bell? You'll miss the fire."

The father still not opening his eyes she looked around wonderingly and then added what she thought could not fail to bring him to his feet:

"Wake up, papa. You'll miss the fire and be fined!"

When he did not stir she knew that something was wrong, and turned her tearful, puzzled face to the older people.

"Never mind the bell, darling," someone answered, "papa won't go the fire tonight."

"But," persisted the baby, "he always got up before when the bell rang; why wouldn't he get up? What's mamma crying for? What's everybody crying for?"

And the troubled little child burst into tears and, crying piteously at what she did not know, was carried gently back to her cot to cry herself to sleep again.

How to Entertain Well.

A hostess should think twice before she invites people to her house. She should be so generous as to let her friends alone, unless she wishes to treat them well. Then, having made up her mind to invite them, she must remember that, from that moment she is their slave. She is to be all attention and all suavity. If she has nothing to offer them but a cup of tea, she must make it a "beaker full of the warm south" by her manner. In the smallest house, the humblest surroundings, the hostess is queen, and she must be gracious. If she is not, she is a snob, a vulgarian and a poor creature, no matter if her husband is a millionaire, a president, or a great scholar. A lady should be very particular to specify whom she wishes to see, and no lady should go to a strange house uninvited, on the spoken belief of some other person that she will be welcome. Still less should a gentleman presume too much. A young gentleman may be taken by a married lady, who is all powerful, to a ball, as she is supposed to endorse his respectability, but it is always better for him to leave his card, and for him to receive an invitation. If, however, through any misapprehension, a person gets into a house uninvited, a hostess should never show by word or manner that she observes it. The very fact that a person has crossed her threshold gives, for the moment, that person a claim on the politeness of a hostess.—Mrs. John Sherwood in Ladies' Home Journal for November.

Salvation Lassies in Saloons.

The women of the Salvation Army have taken to visiting the liquor saloons of New York and Brooklyn in order to sell the War Cry, the newspaper of the army. Two of the very pretty army girls were in a notorious saloon not a thousand miles away from the Sun office, on this mission the other night. Leaning against the bar were gamblers and pugilists, and one or two who have been jailed for using their pistols too freely. They seemed to be shocked at the appearance of the girls among them. The modest dress and red ribbons on the ugly straw bonnets easily told them who the visitors were. Several papers were bought, when a strapping pugilist strode up and said: "Young women, I'll buy the whole bundle if you promise never to come here again." The proposition was not considered for a second. They said they believed it to be their duty to visit such places, adding that the nuns of the Roman Catholic Church did so. "But, don't you know that somebody might insult you," the big man almost pleaded. "No, sir," replied the speaker of the two, and in words touched with scorn, she added: "No man will insult us; the remarks of others would not hurt us." It was only after persistent entreaty from the proprietor that the zealous women were induced to leave the place

Dancing Round Dances.

You may, with propriety, strive to climb hills, even if you are not a climber. You are justified in surf bathing, even though you cannot swim. It is not a heinous offence to go driving along the sands when you do not know how to drive. You may converse with a Boston girl, even though you have never read a page of Browning and know not Emerson. You may be forgiven for losing your heart to a Newport girl when you haven't a cent to your name; but, young man, be warned in time—if you insist upon entering the ballroom and dancing round dances when you don't know how, says the Galop, execution by electricity is too good for you, hanging would render you illustrious, and death by the slow, torturing process of being shot in the back with a baked apple would be your just desert.

The easiest way for a good wife to get along pleasantly is to practice what her husband preaches.

THE JOKE OF THE SEASON.

Just a Thread on the Shoulder, But You Never Find the End of It.

The drummer always brings the latest trick. Here it is, says the Lewiston, Me., Journal:

Take a spool of white basting cotton. Drop it into your inside coat pocket and, threading a needle with it, pass it up through the shoulder of your coat. Leave the end an inch or so long on the outside of your coat and take off the needle. Four men out of five will try to pick that whole thread off your shoulder, and will pull on the spool until it actually does seem as though your clothes are all bastings, and that they were unraveling not only your clothes, but yourself.

"I was in to see Wilson Barrett in 'Claudian' in Boston last week," said the travelling man. "It was in the most interesting and pathetic portion of the play. Everybody was rapt. I was sitting bolt upright, and didn't know or care to know a soul around me, when suddenly I felt some one tugging at that basting cotton that I myself had clean forgotten. I didn't say a word and did not move. Foot by foot it unrolled. Half glancing around, I saw a man—a total stranger—yanking at that thread. His face was scarlet. He had pulled out about ten yards and was now hauling in hand over hand. He didn't dare to stop because he had decorated my back and the whole aisle with basting cotton. He hardly dared to go ahead, for he didn't know what portion of my domestic interior economy he was trifling with. Rip! Rip! went the thread. Hand over hand he yanked it in. The aisle was full of it. 'For Heaven's sake! will it never end?' said he above his breath. I sat perfectly still and ran the spool while he pulled. How I wanted to yell. I never saw anything in my life half so funny. The whole section of the house got onto it. They didn't know whether to laugh at me or him, and some looked on amazed at the spectacle. At last the stranger behind me gave one frantic rip and yanked out about 11 yards on one bunch, and as the cotton got twisted around his watch chain, over his eye-glasses, in his very hair and filled his lap, I turned around and producing the spool from my pocket, said: 'I am very much obliged for your interest and very sorry that I misled you. You see I have about 124 yards left, but I presume that you don't care for any more tonight. I am honestly sorry, but I can't help smiling.'

"The man was a modest sort of gentleman in appearance. His face was red as fire even to his ears. He looked at me then at the spool. He changed color once or twice, and then as the crowd caught on a big laugh went up right in one of the painful passages of 'Claudian,' and the gentleman who had intended to pull that thread off joined in the laugh and said, 'I will square that up on my wife when I get home; but, my friend, I swear to heaven that I did think at one time that I was going to undress you where you sat.'

"It catches every time, and my own wife has been fooled twice on it."

(From the New York Times.)

A little thread hung on the shoulder of Broker Dan Dixon's coat when he went on the floor of the Produce Exchange after lunch yesterday. Prince Claggett, during one of the lulls, called his attention to it.

"Pull it out," said Dixon.

Claggett pulled and pulled until he had pulled out about six feet of cotton thread. Mr. Dixon had had concealed under his arm a whole spool of it. There was great laughter at Mr. Claggett's expense. He winked wisely and went away. Presently he reappeared. A little thread also hung from the seam in the arm of his coat. He intended to get even. He walked into the wheat pit. Everybody there had been posted by Mr. Dixon.

"Claggett," said two or three as he walked about, "there's a loose thread on your coat."

"Pull it out," said Claggett.

About twenty brokers rushed at him, and, amid much shouting and hilarity, they not only pulled the thread, but they ripped the coat up the back "like a shad," as a member put it.

Otherwise the Produce Exchange proceedings were uneventful yesterday.

On the 9th day of that month he will have completed the period of absence from Hungary which will terminate and forfeit his citizenship of that country. His two sons have become Italian citizens and the venerable patriot has been strongly urged to do likewise, but he probably will not do so.

IRENE'S LOVE

Was Strong Enough to Brave the Wrath of Her People.

Irene Washburn, the daughter of an aristocratic branch of the Six Nation Indians, has created a very considerable sensation by eloping with a young Montrealer named W. L. Bruce. Irene is the daughter of Mrs. Emma Washburn, the well known Indian songstress, "Neoskaleta," whom she sometimes accompanies when on her concert tours. It was on one of these trips that she met the young Montrealer. They were in Montreal, and the mother of young Bruce thoughtlessly invited "Neoskaleta" and her black eyed daughter Irene to be their guests. The invitation was accepted and the visit lasted a week. During this time young Bruce was devoted to the fascinating Indian maiden, and she was as fascinated by his devotion so that when the parting came there was a tacit understanding that the friendship so quickly formed should be continued by letter. Irene returned to her home on the Six Nations Reservation, where she resided with her aunt, a Mrs. Powless, and though she wrote regularly to her darling she did not always get an answer. Believing something wrong she enlisted a bright young Indian friend to assist her, and act as a sort of distributing post-office. Every week came the love laden missives, and faithfully were they answered. Each one but served to whet Bruce's determination to possess the daughter of "Neoskaleta," and finally he wrote that he would meet her on Sunday last, and that they should drive to a minister, be married and leave at once for Montreal. Mrs. Powless "smelled a rat" and was determined that Irene should not marry the young man. Though she knew nothing of the arrangements for Sunday, there was something in Irene's actions that made her very suspicious. Mrs. Powless told certain of her friends among the indians to keep a sharp lookout for the young paleface, and when he put in an appearance to run him off the Reservation. But little Irene had her staunch Indian friends, too, and they assisted to smooth the way. On Sunday Bruce drove from Brantford accompanied by a well-known young Indian through whom it is supposed the correspondence was kept up. At a spot near Kanyengeh, the lovers met, but their meeting was intruded upon. Irene was carried back to her home, and Bruce was put on a ferry and sent across the river. Irene's friends arranged for a meeting on Monday. They met, drove rapidly to a church, were married and had just started away when she was again taken from him. Bruce could do nothing alone, and with a whisper of hope to her drove rapidly to Brantford to institute legal proceedings for the recovery of his lawful wife. But while he sat closeted with his lawyer, Irene's friends were at work. During Monday night they stole her from the house, brought her to this city and delivered her up to her husband. On Tuesday they left for Montreal as happy as two young doves.—Brantford Expositor.

Britain's Greatness.

The Chicago Herald says: Let us not deceive ourselves with fictitious greatness. There is another country at whose greatness we may well pause for contemplation. Its area exceeds eight and a half million square miles. The basis of its power is not land but waters. Its greatness is maritime, and its coast line is twenty-eight thousand five hundred miles long. It lies on both sides of the equator and its boundries touch the extremes of heat and cold. Its uncultivated area which can be made to feed unborn millions without the help of the United States, covers millions of square miles. It contains one hundred thousand square miles of forests, which are being jealously preserved, while our's are being ruthlessly sacrificed. Its population amounts to 315,000,000 souls including pretty nearly all the races known to man. Its revenue for government amounts to more than a thousand million dollars annually, only one fourth of which is levied in direct taxation. It has nearly a million of men under arms. It has one policeman for every sixteen square miles of its entire area. Its 246 war vessels are all in commission, not rotting in harbors. Its merchant navy consists of 30,000 ships, manned by 270,000 sailors. Its sea-going tonnage amounts to eight and a half millions. It surpasses in steamers all other powers on the globe and nearly equals their combined total in sailing vessels. Forty-nine per cent. of the carrying power of the world is under its flag. Nearly half the entire yearly cargo of the world is under that flag; more than half the ship earnings from freights and passengers belong to it. Two-thirds of the tonnage annually built belongs to it. The banks of that Empire transact one-third of the business of the entire world. Its manufactures comprise one-third those of all Europe. It uses 30 per cent. of the horse power of the world. Its enormous debt, which it uses as the most profitable investment of its own earnings, amounts to only 9 per cent. of its wealth. It is the wealthiest State in the world, and its wealth has been made by its exports. Its name is Great Britain, and it abandoned, after a full and fair trial, the economic policy to which the United States fatuously clings. It sent its ships to every clime; it offered its wares in every port; it asked no tax on articles offered in exchange, and the cargoes its ships carried back to their wharves enriched it as much as those they had borne away.

The Safest Part of the Train.

That was a keen observer who exclaimed as he clambered over the wreck at Ninth and Brown streets yesterday, that he would not ride hereafter on either end of a railroad train. The middle cars are always the safest. They do not receive a destructive blow from either a front or rear collision; if the engine leaves the track they usually remain in place, and they are never snapped off, as the rear car sometimes is. Almost the only case in which the middle cars suffer is when they are thrown off track by the breaking of a coupling or of some part of the running gear, and that is as likely to happen to one part of the train as another.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

EDITOR ADVANCE.—I'm not going to scold you, for my cor. under the headline "Sydenham" in issue of Oct. 31st was done well "in print," but it is only fair that I should point out an omission at the ending. The two metrical lines there I borrowed and placed quotation marks accordingly, which the types failed to show. They were at the commencement of a poetical advertisment very cleverly gotten up by a merchant in Owen Sound in the long ago. I will give you the first part of the poem as a fair sample of the whole:

"I would tell to all the world, that is to all Owen Sound,
With a few of the neighboring townships around,
That as summer is come, I've a summer supply,
Of hard goods, and soft goods, and goods wet and dry.
I've no alcohol goods, rather alcohol evils,
Because I don't wish to change the good folks into deevils."

From our own Correspondent.

Oh, Mr. Editor, if you could only change places with your humble Cor. for a fortnight or so, you would have more fun than you have had since you came to Flesherton, but I suppose it is no use thinking about such a change, so I will have to enjoy it alone. One day recently I had the pleasure of overhearing a conversation that passed between two of our residents regarding Oben's effusions. One of them wasn't a subscriber, but he said he stepped over occasionally to his neighbor's to see if Oben had anything in the paper concerning him. "I hate," he said, "to see my name in the paper, and if I knew who the writer was I would just delight in giving him a good application of tanned cowhide." I tell you, Mr. Editor, I was "scart," for not until then did I notice the awful amount of said material in a manufactured state that he carried around on his feet. It struck me that this must be the weapon he alluded to, and as I once more took a square look at what he was standing on, a shudder passed through my whole frame, and for once I fully realized my perilous position, and I glanced excitedly around in search of a more secluded spot to hide, but fortunately for me, as I was musing thus, he moved off in another direction, and once more I breathed freely.

I happened to hear a story less than a year ago about a gentleman very much like this one, who was travelling through the woods in quest of game. The morning being very fine he did not think it necessary to bring his overcoat, but as luck would have it, rain began to fall while he was in the woods. He saw a short distance away a friendly hollow log which he betook himself to and quickly crawled into it snake fashion. He lay there for a long time, dry and comfortable until he became aware of the fact that the hole was getting smaller, the rain having swollen the dry log to such an extent that he was fast becoming as if in a vice. Alas, he was there to remain, and after a few futile attempts he gave it up in despair, and quietly resigned himself to his fate. As death stared him in the face he thought of all his friends and everything he held dear, and all his wicked deeds and the mean tricks he played, came fresh to his memory one by one as he lay there encircled round in the tight embrace of the old elm. He seemed to get a plausible excuse for all of them until he remembered how he used to go to his neighbor's and read The Advance, Oben's writing along with the rest. This seemed to stick. He never subscribed or advertised or even gave a kind word of encouragement to the Editor, but still he enjoyed the reading of his paper. Well sir, he felt so mean and small about this that he slipped out of the log without any trouble, but it is my humble opinion he took his boots off before he entered

Miss Francis Moody has returned to Toronto after spending a couple of weeks visiting among her friends. While home she got two quilts ready for the frame and invited quite a number of her lady friends one afternoon to help her do the quilting. A number of young men were also invited to come at night to participate in the dance, and they did ample justice to the good music furnished by W. Sackett & Co., by indulging in various dances, such as quadrilles, waltzes and so 4th.

Miss Ida Blakeston and Miss Brown, of Egremont, and Miss Ferguson, of Proton, have gone to Toronto to spend the winter. We are compelled to think there must be some strange fascination about the city that draws so many of our fair ladies away from their country homes. By the way, our residents are fixing up their houses with tarpaper and lumber, sand, lime, hair and shingles. It leads one to believe we are going to have a very cold winter.

Mr Arch Ferguson lost a fine brood mare about two weeks ago. Apparently there was nothing the matter with her. She fell down when plowing, and died in a few minutes. Mr. W. Stuart also lost a fine mare a few days ago. Inflammation, we understand, was the cause or death. We take no pleasure in chronicling facts of this nature.

Thanksgiving Day passed off here very quitely. Occasionally we could hear the loud report of a gun as some lucky hunter got a glimpse of some animal or bird which he thought had enjoyed life long enough. We did not hear of any deer or bears being killed, although the trampled condition of the grain last harvest would prove even to an inexperienced hunter that the latter animal was plentiful enough in our woods. It is quite evident that our hunters would rather come across a flock of partridges than Bruin.

Mr. J. T. Wilson, one of our energetic farmers, having got through plowing, and no other work pushing him, went over to the townline between Glenelg and Artemesia and performed some statute labor, in the shape of covering a very rough crossing. It speaks very badly of those townships to have a resident of Proton go over to fix their roads, and the least thing they can do is to give him some remuneration for his pains.

Mr. Aaron Earnest has left our beautiful village and gone to reside in Hopeville. We wish him success in his new home.

I had the foregoing items sealed and ready to post, but hearing from the ever watchful P. cor. of the disappearance of infant Vidi, and knowing he must feel very lonesome in the absence of his contemporary, I take this opportunity of extending to him my heartfelt sympathy, hoping that it may aid to revive him out of the lethargy into which he has fallen. I am quite ignorant of what has befallen the child. At the first glance at the article I thought P. cor. was accusing me very wrongly, but when I studied it I found out he cleared me completely, (you know he has a peculiar way of putting a hidden meaning in his compositions) it reads this way: "Oben didn't (didn't what) Ab. ducked him, (abduct him) so you see he clears Oben altogether and gives the name of the guilty party. It's as plain as A B C.

We notice Mr. A. McDonald has erected a small log cabin in his orchard where he intends keeping his two cows. We wonder why a man owning a farm with plenty of outhouses should have to build a stable for a couple of cows away from his own buildings altogether. We presume his tenant could answer the question.

Messrs. J. Moody and J. Dobson have returned from Muskoka after spending some time there in a vain search for work and wages. According they report times very dull there.

Mr. H. Lamont has gone to the Michigan lumber woods to spend the winter.

There has been a continual drizzle, but not enough to make our hardy farmers quit ploughing. Occasionally we hear Joe Campbell yelling "get up Doll!" as he raises his plow over a stone. The plow will be giving him its last kick for this fall one of those days.

OBEN.

Kimberley.

From our own Correspondent.

The marriage of Mr. Henry Ellis and Miss M. Lawrence, and Mr. W. H. Stewart and Miss E. Ellis came off on Wednesday eve last, at 6.45 p.m., in the church here as announced in your issue of the 14th. Early in the evening people could be seen making their way through the mud to the church, and by 6 15 o'clock the church was comfortably filled, notwithstanding the very inclement weather. After the marriage ceremony was performed, the happy couple drove to the residence of Mr. G. Lawrence, where they did ample justice to the good things which were provided for the occasion. About an hour later quite a number of the young people gathered at the house for the purpose of racking the nerves of some of the inmates, but the interested party, not caring to stand the racket, gave them a small sum of money which satisfied the cravings of the wild men and they went home without further delay. On the morning of the 21st inst., Mr. and Mrs. Ellis took their departure for New Hampshire, where Mr. Ellis is engaged as foreman on a farm. Your cor. wishes them every success.

Quite a number of the sportsmen of Kimberley and surrounding country took up their abode in a shanty in the township of Osprey some time ago for the purpose of trying to secure some venison, which thing they did, Mr. William Stewart, J. P., being the lucky marksman. Imagine the joy which filled each heart when bang, bang, bang, was heard, and immediately after shouts that made the woods ring from the lucky gunners. The boys say they never had as much fun in the same time before, and they intend trying it again as soon as there is enough snow.

We have not quite forgotton your valuable paper Mr. Editor.

Mr. Joseph Stinson, druggist, of Collingwood and Mr. Wm. Stinson, of Hill Bros., Markdale, are visiting their parents here.

Mr. Wright, of Flesherton, is engaged to teach our school for the coming year. We are sorry at having to part with our present teacher, Mr. McArdle, who has been an efficient and painstaking man and one who has given general satisfaction. We wish you success Mc.

Mr. Jas. and Hilliard Hutchinson have returned from their summer in the vicinity of Calgary, and say that it is just the place for cattle ranching and farming.

Miss C. Acheson is engaged as teacher for school section No. 2, Proton, for the ensuing year.

We quite agree with your editorial in last week's issue of the Advance regarding the father of crime and pauperism. If the electors do vote from principal the present anti-temperance and popish government will bite the dust.

They are going to have a lively time at the entertainment given by the teacher and pupils of school section No. 2, Proton, on the evening December 6th, health and weather permitting.

Our graveyard has been very neatly fenced with barb-wire, and preparations are being made to have the ground levelled and put in shape.

At last an able and pushing committee have been put at the head of the much talked of shed in connection with the church here, and the work will be pushed rapidly forward if the weather permits.

The officers of Victoria cheese factory wound up the business on the 23rd for the year. The auditors' report showed that there was 663,670 lbs. of milk sent to the factory, which made 63,432 lbs. of cheese. This was sold for $5,704.11. After paying for manufacturing and general expenses, it left $4,888 to be divided amongst the patrons—it taking on an average for the season 10⅓ lbs. of milk to make a lb. of cheese.

AN AMERICAN GIRL.

She walked very fast, after she left the house. She wanted to reach Oldclough before one whit of her anger cooled down, though, somehow, she felt quite sure that, even when her anger died out, her courage would not take flight with it. Mr. Dugald Binnie had not proved to be a very fascinating person. He was an acrid, dictatorial old man; he contradicted Lady Theobald flatly every five minutes, and bullied his man-servant; but it was not against him Lucia was aroused. She felt that Lady Theobald was quite capable of suggesting to him that Francis Barold would be a good match for her, and if she had done so, it was scarcely his fault if he had accepted the idea. She understood now why she had been allowed to visit Octavia, and why divers other things had happened. She had been sent to walk with Francis Barold; he had been almost reproached when he had not called; perhaps her ladyship had been good enough to suggest to him that it was his duty to further her plans. She was as capable of that as of anything else which would assist her to gain her point. The girl's cheeks grew hotter and hotter, her eyes brighter at every step, because every step bought some new thought; her hands trembled, and her heart beat.

"I shall never be afraid of her again," she said, as she turned the corner into the road. "Never! never!"

At that very moment a gentleman stepped out of the wood at her right, and stopped before her.

She started back, with a cry.

"Mr. Burmistone!" she said; "Mr. Burmistone!"

She wondered if he had heard her last words; she fancied he had. Her took hold of her shaking little hand, and looked down at her excited face.

"I am glad I waited for you," he said in the quietest possible tone. "Something is the matter."

She knew their was no use in trying to conceal the truth, and she was not in the mood to make the effort. She scarcely knew herself.

She gave quite a fierce little laugh.

"I am angry!" she said. "You have never seen me angry before. I am on my way to my—to Lady Theobald."

He held her hand as calmly as before. He understood a great deal more than she could have imagined.

"What are you going to say to her?" he asked.

She laughed again.

"I am going to ask her what she means. I am going to tell her she has made a a mistake. I am going to prove to her that I am not such a coward, after all. I am going to tell her that I dare disobey her—that is what I am going to say to her," she concluded, decisively.

He held her hand rather closer.

"Let us take a stroll in the copse and talk it over," he said. "It is deliciously cool there."

"I don't want to be cool," she said. But he drew her gently with him, and a few steps took them into the shade of the young oaks and pines, and there paused.

"She has made you very angry," he said.

And then, almost before she knew what she was doing, she was pouring forth the whole of her story—even more of it than she had told Octavia. She had not at all intended to do it, but she did it, nevertheless.

"I am to marry Mr. Francis Barold, if he will take me," she said, with a bitter little smile,—"Mr. Francis Barold, who is so much in love with me—as you know. His mother approves of the match, and sent him here to make love to me—which he has done, as you have seen. I have no money of my own, but if I make a marriage which pleases him, Dugald Binnie will probably leave me his—which it is thought will be an inducement to my cousin—who needs one. If I marry him, or rather he marries me, Lady Theobald thinks Mr. Binnie will be pleased. It does not even matter whether Francis is pleased or not—and, of course, I am out of the question—but it is hoped that it will please Mr. Binnie. The two ladies have talked it over, and decided the matter. I dare say they have offered me to Francis, who has very likely refused me, though perhaps he may be persuaded to relent in time—if I am very humble, and he is shown the advantage of having Mr. Binnie's money added to his own—but I have no doubt I shall have to be very humble indeed. That is what I learned from Lady Theobald, last night, and it is what I am going to talk to her about. Is it enough to make one angry, do you think—is it enough?"

He did not tell her whether he thought it enough or not. Her looked at her with steady eyes.

"Lucia," he said, "I wish you would let me go and talk to Lady Theobald."

"You!" she said, with a little start.

"Yes," he answered. "Let me go to her. Let me tell her that, instead of marrying Francis Barold, you will marry me. If you will say yes to that, I think I can promise that you need never be afraid of her any more."

The fierce color died out of her cheeks, and the tears rushed to her eyes. She raised her face with a pathetic look.

"Oh," she whispered, "you must be very sorry for me. I think you have been sorry for me from the first."

"I am desperately in love with you," he answered, in his quietest way. "I have been desperately in love with you from the first. May I go?"

She looked at him, for a moment, inscrutinously. Then she faltered:

"Yes."

She still looked up at him, and then, in spite of her happiness, or perhaps because of it, she suddenly began to cry softly, and forgot she had been angry at all, as he took her into his strong, kind arms.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE GARDEN-PARTY.

The morning of the garden-party arose bright and clear, and Slowbridge awakened in a great state of excitement. Miss Chickie, having worked until midnight, that all her orders might be completed, was so overpowered by her labors as to have to take her tea and toast in bed.

At Oldclough, varied sentiments prevailed. Lady Theobald's manner was chiefly distinguished by implacable rigidity. She had chosen, as an appropriate festal costume, a funeral-black moire antique, enlivened by massive fringes and ornaments of jet—her jewelry being chains and manacles of the latter, which rattled as she moved, with a sound somewhat suggestive of bones.

Mr. Dugald Binnie, who had received an invitation, has as yet amiably forborne to say whether he would accept it or not. He had been out when Mr. Burmistone called, and had not seen him.

When Lady Theobald descended to breakfast, she found him growling over his newspaper, and he glanced up at her with a polite scowl.

"Going to a funeral?" he demanded.

"I accompany my granddaughter to this—this entertainment," her ladyship responded. "It is scarcely a joyous occasion, to my mind."

"No need to dress yourself like that, if it isn't," ejaculated Mr. Binnie. "Why don't you stay at home, if you don't want to go? Man's all right, isn't he? Once knew a man of the name of Burmistone, myself. One of the few decent fellows I've met. If I was sure this was the same man, I'd go myself. When I find a fellow who's neither knave nor fool, I stick to him. Believe I'll send to find out. Where's Lucia?"

What his opinion of Lucia was, it was difficult to discover. He had an agreeable habit of staring at her over the top of his paper, and over his dinner. The only time he had made any comment upon her, was the first time he saw her in the dress she had copied from Octavia's.

"Nice gown that," he blurted out. "Didn't get it here, I'll wager."

"It is an old dress I remodeled," answered Lucia, somewhat alarmed. "I made it myself."

"Doesn't look like it," he said, gruffly.

Lucia had touched up another dress, and was very happy in the prospect of wearing it at the garden-party.

"Don't call on grandmamma until after Wednesday," she had said to Mr. Burmistone. "Perhaps she wouldn't let me go. She will be very angry, I am sure."

"And you are not afraid?"

"No," she answered, "I am not afraid at all. I shall not be afraid again."

In fact, she had perfectly confounded her ladyship by her demeanor. She bore her fiercest glance without quailing in the least, or making any effort to evade it; under her most scathing comments she was composed and unmoved. On the first occasion of my lady's referring to her plans for her future, she received a blow which fairly stunned her. The girl rose from her chair, and looked her straight in the face, undinchingly, and with a suggestion of hauteur not easy to confront.

"I beg you will not speak to me of that again," she said. "I will not listen." And turning about, she walked out of the room.

"This," her ladyship had said, in sepulchral tones, when she recovered her breath—"this is one of the results of Miss Octavia Bassett.' And nothing more had been said on the subject since.

No one in Slowbridge was in more brilliant spirits than Octavia herself on the morning of the fete. Before breakfast, Miss Belinda was startled by the arrival of another telegram, which ran as follows:

> Arrived to-day, per Russia. Be with you to-morrow evening. Friend with me.
> MARTIN BASSETT.

On reading this communication, Miss Belinda burst into floods of tears.

"Dear, dear Martin!" she wept. "To think that we should meet again! Why didn't he let us know he was on the way? I should have been so anxious that I should not have slept at all."

"Well," remarked Octavia, "I suppose that would have been an advantage."

Suddenly, she approached Miss Belinda, kissed her, and disappeared out of the room, as if by magic, not returning for a quarter of an hour, looking rather soft, and moist, and brilliant about the eyes, when she did return.

Octavia was a marked figure upon the grounds at that garden-party.

"Another dress, my dear," remarked Mrs. Burnham. "And what a charming color she has, I declare! She is usually paler. Perhaps we owe this to Lord Lansdowne."

"Her dress is becoming, at all events," privately remarked Miss Lydia Burnham, whose taste had not been consulted about her own.

"It is she who is becoming," said her sister. "It is not the dress so much, though her clothes always have a look, some way. She's prettier than ever to-day, and is enjoying herself."

She was enjoying herself. Mr. Francis Barold observed it rather gloomily as he stood apart. She was enjoying herself so much that she did not seem to notice that he had avoided her, instead of going up to claim her attention. Half a dozen men were standing about her and making themselves agreeable; and she was apparently quite equal to the emergencies of the occasion. The young men from Broadoaks had at once attached themselves to her train.

"I say, Barold," they had said to him, "why didn't you tell us about this? Jolly good fellow you are, to come mooning here for a couple of months and keep it all to yourself."

And then had come Lord Lansdowne, who, in crossing the lawn to shake hands with his host, had been observed to keep his eye fixed upon one particular point.

"Burmistone," he said, after having spoken his first words, "who is that tall girl in white?"

And in ten minutes, Lady Theobald, Mrs. Burnham, Mr. Barold, and divers others too numerous to mention, saw him standing at Octavia's side, evidently with no intention of leaving it.

Not long after this, Francis Barold found his way to Miss Belinda, who was very busy and rather nervous.

"Your niece is evidently enjoying herself," he remarked.

"Octavia is most happy to-day," answered Miss Belinda. "Her father will reach Slowbridge this evening. She has been looking forward to his coming with great anxiety."

"Ah!" commented Barold.

"Very few people understand Octavia," said Miss Belinda. "I'm not sure that I follow all her moods myself. She is more affectionate than people fancy. She—she has very pretty ways. I am very fond of her. She is not as frivolous as she appears to those who don't know her well."

Barold stood gnawing his mustache and made no reply. He was not very comfortable. He felt himself ill-used by Fate, and rather wished he had returned to London from Broadoaks, instead of loitering in Slowbridge. He had amused himself at first, but in time he had been surprised to find his amusement lose something of its zest. He glowered across the lawn at the group under a certain beech-tree, and as he did so, Octavia turned her face a little and saw him. She stood waving her fan slowly and smiling at him in a calm way, which reminded him very much of the time he had first caught sight of her at Lady Theobald's high tea.

He condescended to saunter over the grass to where she stood. Once there, he proceeded to make himself as disagreeable as possible, in a silent and lofty way. He felt it only due to himself that he should. He did not approve at all of the manner in which Lansdowne kept by her.

"It's deucedly bad form on his part," he said, mentally. "What does he mean by it?"

Octavia, on the contary, did not ask what he meant by it. She chose to seem rather well entertained, and did not notice that she was being frowned down. There was no reason why she should not find Lord Lansdowne entertaning; he was an agreeable young fellow, with an inexhaustible fund of good spirits, and no nonsense about him. He was fond of all pleasant novelty, and Octavia was a pleasant novelty. He had been thinking of paying a visit to America, and he asked innumerable questions concering that country, all of which Octavia answered.

"I know half a dozen fellows who have been there," he said. "And they all enjoyed it tremendously."

"If you go to Nevada, you must visit the mines at Bloody Gulch," she said.

"Where?" he ejaculated. "I say, what a name! Don't deride my youth and ignorance, Miss Bassett."

"You can call it L'Argentville if you would rather," she replied.

"I would rather try the other, thank you," he laughed. "It has a more hilarious sound. Will they despise me at Bloody Gulch, Miss Bassett? I never killed a man in my life."

Barold turned and walked away, angry, and more melancholy than he could have believed.

"It is time I went back to London," he chose to put it. "The place begins to be deucedly dull."

"Mr. Francis Barold seems rather out spirits," said Mrs. Burnham to Lady Theobald, "Lord Lansdowne interferes with his pleasure."

"I had not observed it," answered her ladyship. "And it is scarcely likely that Mr. Francis Barold would permit his pleasure to be interfered with, even by the son of the Marquis of Lauderdale."

But she glared at Barold, as he passed, and beckoned to him

"Where is Lucia?" she demanded.

"I saw her with Burmistone, half an hour ago," he answered coldly. "Have you any message for my mother? I shall return to London to-morrow,—leaving here early."

She turned quite pale. She had not counted upon this at all, and it was extremely inopportune.

"What has happened?" she asked, rigidly.

He looked slightly surprised.

"Nothing whatever," he replied. "I have remained here longer than I intended."

She began to move the manacles on her right wrist. He made not the smallest profession of reluctance to go. She said, at last:

"If you will find Lucia, you will oblige me."

She was almost uncivil to Miss Pilcher, who chanced to join her after he was gone. She had not the slightest intention of allowing her plans to be frustrated, and was only roused to fresh obstinacy by encountering indifference on one side and rebellion on the other. She had not brought up Lucia under her own eye for nothing. She had been disturbed of late, but by no means considered herself baffled. With the assistance of Mr. Dugald Binnie, she could certainly subdue Lucia, though Mr. Dugald Binnie had been of no great help, so far. She would do her duty unflinchingly. In fact she chose to persuade herself that, if Lucia was brought to a proper frame of mind, there could be no real trouble with Francis Barold.

CHAPTER XXV.

"SOMEBODY ELSE."

But Barold did not make any very ardent search for Lucia. He stopped to watch a game of lawn tennis, in which Octavia and Lord Lansdowne had joined, and finally forgot Lady Theobald's errand altogether.

For some time, Octavia did not see him. She was playing with great spirit, and Lord Lansdowne was following her delightedly.

Finally a chance of the game bringing her to him, she turned suddenly and found Barold's eyes fixed upon her.

"How long have you been there?" she asked.

"Some time," he answered. "When you are at liberty, I wish to speak to you."

"Do you?" she said.

She seemed a little unprepared for the repressed energy of his manner, which he strove to cover by a greater amount of coldness than usual.

"Well," she said, after thinking a moment, "the game will soon be ended. I am going through the conservatories with Lord Lansdowne, in course of time; but I dare say he can wait."

She went back, and finished the game, apparently enjoying it as much as ever. When it was over, Barold made his way to her.

He had resented her remaining oblivious of his presence when he stood near her, and he had resented her enjoyment of her surroundings, and now, as he led her away, leaving Lord Lansdowne rather disconsolate, he resented the fact that she did not seem nervous, or at all impressed by his silence.

"What do you want to say to me?" she asked. "Let us go and sit down on one of the arbors. I believe I am a little tired—not that I mind it, though. I've been having a lovely time."

Then she began to talk about Lord Lansdowne.

"I like him ever so much," she said. "Do you think he will really go to America? I wish he would—but if he does, I hope it won't be for a year or so—I mean, until we go back from Europe. Still, it's rather uncertain when we shall go back. Did I tell you I had persuaded Aunt Belinda to travel with us? She's horribly frightened, but I mean to make her go. She'll get over being frightened after a little while."

Suddenly she turned and looked at him.

"Why don't you say something?" she demanded. "What a the matter?"

"It is not necessary for me to say anything."

She laughed.

"Do you mean because I am saying everything myself? Well, I suppose I am. I am—awfully happy to-day, and can't help talking. It seems to make the time go."

Her face had lighted up curiously. There was a delighted excitement in her eyes, puzzling him.

"Are you so fond of your father as all that?"

She laughed again—a clear, exultant laugh.

"Yes," she answered, "of course I am as fond of him as all that. It's quite natural, isn't it?"

"I haven't observed the same degree of enthusiasm in all the young ladies of my acquaintance," he returned, dryly.

He thought such rapture disproportionate to the cause, and regarded it grudgingly.

They turned into an arbor, and Octavia sat down and leaned forward on the rustic table. Then she turned her face up to look at the vines covering the roof.

"It looks rather spidery, doesn't it?" she remarked. "I hope it isn't; don't you?"

The light fell bewitchingly on her round little chin and white throat; and a bar of sunlight struck on her upturned eyes, and the blonde rings on her forehead.

"There is nothing I hate more than spiders," she said, with a little shiver, "unless," seriously, "it's caterpillars—caterpillars I loathe!"

Then she lowered her gaze, and gave her hat—a large, white Rubens, all soft curling feathers and satin bows—a charming tip over her eyes.

"The brim is broad," she said. "If anything drops, I hope it will drop on it, instead of on me. Now, what did you want to say?"

He had not sat down, but stood leaning against the rustic wood-work. He looked pale, and was evidently trying to be cooler than usual.

"I brought you here to ask you a question."

"Well," she remarked, "I hope it's an important one. You look serious enough."

"It is important—rather," he responded, with a tone of sarcasm. "You will probably go away soon?"

"That isn't exactly a question," she commented. "And it's not as important to you as to me."

He paused a moment, annoyed because he found it difficult to go on; annoyed because she waited with such undisturbed serenity. But at length he managed to begin again.

"I do not think you are expecting the question I am going to ask," he said. "I—do not think I expected to ask it myself—until to-day. I do not know why—why I should ask it so awkwardly, and feel—at such a disadvantage. I brought you here to ask you—to marry me."

He had scarcely spoken four words before all her airy manner had taken flight, and she had settled herself down to listen. He had noticed this, and had felt it quite natural. When he stopped, she was looking straight into his face. Her eyes were singularly large and bright and clear.

"You did not expect to ask me to marry you," she said. "Why didn't you?"

It was not at all what he had expected. He did not understand her manner at all.

"I—must confess," he said, stiffly, "that I felt at first that there were—obstacles in the way of my doing so."

"What were the obstacles?"

He flushed and drew himself up.

"I have been very unfortunate in my mode of expressing myself," he said. "I told you I was conscious of my own awkwardness."

"Yes," she said, quietly, "you have been unfortunate. That is a good way of putting it."

Then she let her eyes rest on the table a few seconds, and thought a little.

"After all," she said, "I have the consolation of knowing that you must have been very much in love with me. If you had not been very much in love with me, you would never have asked me to marry you. You would have considered the obstacles."

"I am very much in love with you," he said, vehemently, his feelings getting the better of his pride, for once. "However badly I may have expressed myself, I am very much in love with you. I have been wretched for days."

"Was it because you felt obliged to ask me to marry you?" she inquired.

The delicate touch of spirit in her tone and words fired his to fresh admiration, strange to say, It suggested to him possibilities he had not suspected hitherto. He drew nearer to her.

"Don't be too severe on me," he said—quite humbly, considering all things.

And he stretched out his hand, as if to take hers.

But she drew it back, smiling ever so faintly.

"Do you think I don't know what the obstacles are?" she said. "I will tell you."

"My affection was strong enough to sweep them away," he said, "or I should not be here."

She smiled slightly again.

"I know all about them, as well as you do," she said. "I rather laughed at them, at first, but I don't now. I suppose I'm 'impressed by their seriousness,' as Aunt Belinda says. I suppose they are pretty serious—to you."

"Nothing would be so serious to me as that you should let them interfere with my happiness," he answered, thrown back upon himself, and bewildered by her logical manner. "Let us forget them. I was a fool to speak as I did. Won't you answer my question?"

She paused a second, and then answered.

"You didn't expect to ask me to marry you," she said. "And I didn't expect you to——"

"But now——," he broke in, impatiently.

"Now—I wish you hadn't done it."

"You wish——."

"You don't want me," she said. "You want somebody meeker—somebody who would respect you very much, and obey you. I'm not used to obeying people."

"Do you mean also that you would not respect me?" he inquired, bitterly.

"Oh," she replied, "you haven't respected me much!"

"Excuse me——" he began, in his loftiest manner.

"You didn't respect me enough to think me worth marrying," she said. "I was not the kind of girl you would have chosen of your own will."

"You are treating me unfairly!" he cried.

"You are going to give me a great deal, I suppose—looking at it in your way," she went on; "but if I wasn't exactly what you wanted, I had something to give, too. I'm young enough to have a good many years to live, and I should have to live them with you, if I married you. That's something, you know."

He rose from his seat, pale with wrath and wounded feeling.

"Does this mean that you refuse me," he demanded,—"that your answer is no?"

She rose, too—not exultant, nor confused, neither pale nor flushed. He had never seen her prettier, more charming, or more natural.

"It would have been 'no,' even if there had n't been any obstacle," she answered.

"Then," he said, "I need say no more. I see that I have—humiliated myself in vain, and it is rather bitter, I must confess."

"It wasn't my fault," she remarked.

He stepped back, with a haughty wave of the hand, signifying that she should pass out of the arbor before him.

She did so, but just as she reached the entrance, she turned, and stood for a second, framed in by the swinging vines and their blossoms.

"There's another reason why it should be 'no,'" she said. "I suppose I may as well tell you of it. I'm engaged to somebody else."

CHAPTER XXVI.

"JACK."

They first person they saw, when they reached the lawn, was Mr. Dugald Binnie, who had deigned to present himself, and was talking to Mr. Burmistone, Lucia, and Miss Belinda.

"I'll go to them," said Octavia. "Aunt Belinda will wonder where I have been."

But, before they reached the group, they were intercepted by Lord Lansdowne; and Barold had the pleasure of surrendering his charge, and watching her, with some rather sharp pangs, as she was borne off to the conservatories.

"What is the matter with Mr. Barold?" exclaimed Miss Pilcher. "Pray, look at him."

"He has been talking to Miss Octavia Bassett, in one of the arbors," put in Miss Lydia Burnham. "Emily and I passed them a few minutes ago, and they were so absorbed that they did not see us. There it no knowing what has happened."

"Lydia!" exclaimed Mrs. Burnham, in stern reproof of such flippancy.

But, the next moment, she exchanged a glance with Miss Pilcher.

"Do you think——" she suggested. "Is it possible——."

"It really looks very like it," said Miss Pilcher; "though it is scarcely to be credited. See how pale and angry he looks."

Mrs. Burnham glanced towards him, and then a slight smile illuminated her countenance.

"How furious," she remarked, cheerfully, "how furious Lady Theobald will be."

Naturally, it was not very long before the attention of numerous other ladies was directed to Mr. Francis Barold. It was observed that he took no share in the festivities, that he did not regain his natural air of enviable indifference to his surroundings—that he did not approach Octavia Bassett until all was over and she was on the point of going home. What he said to her then, no one heard.

"I am going to London to-morrow. Good-bye."

"Good-bye," she answered, holding out her hand to him. Then she added, quickly, in an under-tone "You oughtn't to think badly of me. You won't after a while."

As they drove homeward, she was rather silent, and Miss Belinda remarked it.

"I am afraid you are tired, Octavia," she said. "It is a pity that Martin should come, and find you tired."

"Oh, I'm not tired. I was only—thinking. It has been a queer day!"

"A queer day, my dear!" ejaculated Miss Belinda. "I thought it a charming day."

"So it has been," said Octavia—which Miss Belinda thought rather inconsistent.

Both of them grew rather restless as they neared the house.

"To think," said Miss Belinda, "of my seeing poor Martin again."

"Suppose," said Octavia, nervously, as they drew up, "suppose they are here—already!"

"They!" exclaimed Miss Belinda. "Who——."

But she got no further. A cry burst from Octavia—a queer, soft little cry.

"They are here!" she said; "they are! Jack—Jack!"

And she was out of the carriage, and Miss Belinda, following her closely, was horrified to see her caught at once in the embrace of a tall, bronzed young man, who, a moment after, drew her into the little parlor, and shut the door.

Mr. Martin Bassett, who was big, and sunburned, and prosperous-looking, stood in the passage, smiling triumphantly.

"M—M—Martin!" gasped Miss Belinda. "What—oh, what does this mean?"

Martin Bassett led her to a seat, and smiled more triumphantly still.

"Never mind, Belinda," he said "Do n' be frightened. It's Jack Belasys, and he's the finest fellow in the West. And she hasn't seen him for two years."

"Martin," Miss Belinda fluttered, "it is not proper—it really isn't."

"Yes, it is," answered Mr. Bassett; "for he's going to marry her, before we go abroad."

It was an eventful day for all parties concered. At its close, Lady Theobald found herself in an utterly bewilderd and thunderstruck condition. As to Mr. Dugald Binnie, more than to any one else, her demoralization was due. That gentleman got into the carriage in rather a better humor than usual.

"Same man I used to know," he remarked. "Glad to see him. I knew him as soon as I set eyes on him."

"Do you allude to Mr. Burmistone?"

"Yes. Had a long talk with him. He's coming to see you, to-morrow. Told him he might come myself. Appears he's taken a fancy to Lucia. Wants to talk it over. Suits me exactly, and suppose it suits her. Looks as if it does. Glad she hasn't taken a fancy to some haw-haw fellow, like that fool, Barold. Girls generally do. Burmistone's worth ten of him."

Lucia, who had been looking steadily out of the carriage-window, turned, with an amazed expression. Lady Theobald had received a shock which made all her man-

March of the Pan-Americans.

Half a speech, half a meal,
Half a sleep—onward
Into more food and talk
Rode the one hundred.
"Come Pan-Americans;
Come, and let's shake your han's,"
So, on to stew and shake
Rode the one hundred.

"Come Pan-Americans!"
Did they reject the plans?
Not though they all were full
And their ves s sundered.
Their's not to make reply,
Theirs not to reason why,
Theirs but to eat and fly,
Into the natural gas
Rode the one hundred.

Banquets to right of them,
Banquets to left of them,
Banquets in front of them
While a world wondered.
Stunned at with word and wine,
Bravely they strive to shine,
But eating shortens breath
And men are talked to death—
Suffering one hundred.

The Masher.

He stands upon the dizzy curbs,
He ogles, grins and stares,
No shame his little frame disturbs,
A face of brass he wears.
His clothes are quite the latest cut,
He wears a showy fob,
He calls himself a toughish nut,
And does the mashing job.

He never did a stroke of work—
He gets his cash from "ma,"
Who bangs the washtub like a Turk
For this sweet Lamy-dah.
He simpers like a silly clown,
On ladies as they pass,
And everybody writes him down
A most consummate ass.

The Third Party Man.

I ain't a goin' to try your patience
By tellin' who done this or that,
I don't make no insinooations,
I jest let on I smell a rat.

That is, I mean, it seems to me so,
But, ef the public think I'm wrong,
I won't deny but wut I be so—
An', fact, it don't smell very strong.

My mind's too fair to lose its balance,
An' say which party has most sense;
There may be folks o' greater talence
That can't sit stiddier on the fence.

I'm an eclectic: ez to choosin'
Twixt this 'n and that I'm plaguey lawth;
I leave a side thet looks like loosin',
But, wile there's doubt, I stick to both.

Ez to my princerples, I glory
In havin' nothin' o' the sort;
I ain't a Wig, I ain't a Tory,
I'm jest a candidate, in short.

That's fair an' square an' perpendicler,
But, ef the public cares a fig
To hev me an'thin' in perticler,
Why, I'm a kind o' peri-Wig.

THE BONNET SEASON OPENING.

'd write a horrid thing, no doubt, did I compose a sonnet as to the way I dodged about one wretched maiden's bonnet.

It was, if I recall aright, the climax of distortion, although its width kept to it's height a horrible proportion.

I dodged about, but couldn't find an open space around it, until I heard some one behind cry, "Keep yours at, confound it!"

"Oh, ho! ah, ha!" the villain cried. "Spare, spare," the maiden uttered; and as invisibly she died, some nasty speech I muttered.

Now mimic tempests roared their rage—I heard them, that is certain; but all I saw of play or stage was the descending curtain.

Low murmurs all the house oppressed at scenic shiftings magic, and as some wild applause I guessed some climax had been tragic.

I also judged from "Ain't she sweet?" and hushed attention centred, and all the "lovelies" maids repeat—the heroine had entered.

"Bang-bang!" I heard a pistol shot—a dying exclamation—so I presumed revenge had wrought its tragic consummation.

I knew they entered from the wings; heard thrilling bursts of feeling; but all I saw were birds and things frescoed upon the ceiling.

So wonder not when I indite a blue and bilious sonnet; I paid my dollar for a sight of selfishness and—bonnet!

Watered Milk.

The milkman who waters his goods generally does so under the impression that the water poured in incorporates itself with the milk and cannot be detected except upon chemical analysis. This shows gross ignorance. The milk will hold only its own fluid; all foreign fluid will be precipitated if the mixture is allowed to stand for a couple of days. Any housewife may spot a dishonest milkman with very little trouble. Let her take a long, slender bottle, cleanse it thoroughly and let it dry out. If, then, it is filled with milk and allowed to stand in a cool—not cold—place for 48 hours, all the foreign fluid will be precipitated—that is, it will settle to the bottom of the bottle. The soured milk will then fill the middle of the bottle and the fatty substance will be floating on top. Sometimes the top will be a layer of cream, then will come a layer of albumen, another artificial device to make the milk look rich; then will come the soured milk, and at the bottom will be the foreign water. The whole scheme of deception can be read by a glance at the bottle after one has had a single lesson in the rudiments of milk inspection. This sort of work is not scientifically satisfactory, but it will always develop the fundamental fact—whether or not the milk is normal.—Interview in St. Louis Globe Democrat.

Six Shots at an Editor.

An Arizona comtemporary in telling how its editor was fired upon the other day by a citizen who dissented from its comments, but whose six shots, discharged at a distance of ten feet from their mark, did not come within a foot of it, states that, nevertheless, the shots where not wholly unavailing, as they wounded a $200 mule and a $50 dog, which damage the awkward marksman compromised for $150. The citizen contemplates leaving the town, and our contemporary encourages him in that purpose by suggesting that a man who holds a gun with both hands, and shuts both eyes when he shoots, is of no account whatever in that district.

THE CHANNEL BRIDGE.

A Leviathan Work Proposed by French Engineers.

Two distinguished French engineers have, with the partial concurrence of certain English professional associates, prepared a plan of a bridge to be built across the English channel, and have made careful estimates of the cost of constructing the same. The bridge would be built of steel, except, of course, the piers upon which it would rest, which would be from 1,000 to 2,000 feet apart. From these stone piers would rise steel cylinders, upon which the bridge would rest, the flooring being quite 150 feet above high tide mark, and the span being, of course, the distance between the piers as given above. It is estimated that such a structure would cost about $180,000,000, that a million tons of steel would be used in its construction, and that it could be built in about ten years' time. The plan of the engineers is that it should be simply a railroad bridge carrying two tracks, and that, to overcome the fear of its use in time of war, it might be arranged that the last spans at either end should be removable, so that the structure would become useless to serve the purposes of an invasion. So far as safety is concerned, after the various great engineering works of this character that have been constructed, a number of the ablest men in the profession are willing to stake their reputation on the statement that a bridge of this kind could be put up which would resist storms of all kinds, and be as safe as any ordinary railroad bridge. It is asserted that the proposed channel bridge would not be an obstruction to navigation, since all vessels could easily pass under it, while the tendency of the swift current of the channel would be to carry vessels, not against the piers, but between these obstructions. One adverse criticism that has been raised against this project is that the work of annually painting the structure to prevent its destruction by rust would entail a great outlay of time and money.

How "Lightning" Sketches Are Made.

In the illustration of his lectures by the drawing of rapid caricatures on the stage Mr. Nast is said to resort to one of those helpful, though by no means illegitimate, tricks which every artist who attempts this sort of "lightning" sketch business before audiences finds it necessary to make use of. No man, however practical and expert, can be sufficiently sure of his nerve and skill under such circumstances to rely wholly upon them, and thus he is compelled to resort to some little harmless deception. The important lines in cartoons so executed Mr. Nast has pricked out beforehand with pin-holes invisible to the spectators, and by these his chalk is guided. Others lightly sketch their outlines with a solution of gum arabic, which is made visible to the artist by the reflection of the glare of the footlights. The most common way, however, is to do the tracing with a mixture of soapsuds and Canada balsam, with a drop or two of some fixed oil. This leaves an invisible but sticky line. When the artist goes to work before the audience he holds in his hand a rag on which crayon dust has been rubbed. This dust catches on the outline and really makes the mark that is apparently produced by the stick of crayon held in the fingers.—New Orleans Picayune.

Carriages for a Sultan.

Two magnificent carriages, of oriental design, have just been built in London for the Emperor of Morocco. One is a hansom cab, of green and gold, which is to be drawn by led mules, as there is no driver's seat. The other is a palanquin, which is to be carried by two mules instead of by human bearers. The interior is sumptuously decorated with green silk, and the seat is so arranged that the Emperor can sit cross-legged if so disposed. On the right side is a little cupboard, which contains a four-chambered revolver with gilt barrels and ivory stock, and a receptacle for ammunition. On the left are a sword-stick and other weapons, and also a letter-box and writing-stand. The palanquin is ingeniously made, so that springs and wheels can at any time be added.—London World.

DRESS REFORM DEMANDED.

Miss Willard on Corsets, Bustles, Etc.

In her annual address to the W.C.T.U. At Chicago, Miss Willard, the President, had the following slap at women's dress:

Woman's everlasting befrilled, bedizened, and bedraggled style of dress is to-day doing more harm to children unborn, born, and dying than all other causes that compel public attention. With ligatured lungs and liver as our past inheritance and present slavery, the wonder is that such small heads can carry all we know! Catch Edison and constrict him inside a wasp waistcoat, and be assured you'll get no more inventions; bind a bustle upon Bismarck, and farewell to German unity; coerce Robert Browning into corsets, and you'll have no more epics; put Parnell in petticoats, and home rule is a lost cause; treat Powderly in the same fashion, and the powder mine of failure will blow up the labor movement. Niggardly waists and niggardly brains go together. The emancipation of one will always keep pace with the other; a ligature around the vital organs at the smallest diameter of the womanly figure means an impoverished blood supply in the brain, and may explain why women scream when they see a mouse, and why they are so terribly afraid of a term which should be their glory, as it is that of their brothers—viz., strong-minded.

Bonneted women are not in normal conditions for thought; high-heeled women are not in normal conditions for motion; corseted women are not in normal conditions for motherhood. Each of the constrictions and contortions involved by these crimes in dress is a distinct violation of loving laws given by our Heavenly Father for our highest happiness and growth. I wonder that men in their broader outlook and magisterial power do not forbid this thing by statute, in the interest of their sons that are to be.

"But ethics and esthetics must go side by side in the blessed work of dress reform, for that is nature's way. The pioneers did not see this and their 'bloomers' speedily dropped into innocuous desuetude. But the moderns—led by Mrs. Annie Jenness Miller, 'that Hebe of the new fashion plate'—have sat at nature's feet, and on my eastern trips I learned what I know to be true in progessive Chicago—that the best are also coming to be the bravest women, that among them there is an absolute craze for getting rid of corsets, and that the divided skirt is worn by tens of thousands whom you might not suspect of so much good sense and courage.

"Much as I am devoted to the ballot for women, I would to-day rather head a crusade against bandaged waists, street-sweeping skirts, and camel's hump bustles than—do I live to say it?—yea, verily, than to vote at Chicago's next election for a Sunday closing mayor!"

FOR HORSE OWNERS.

What is Overloading a Horse, and How Proved?

The following taken from "Bishop on Statutory Crimes"—edition of 1873, page 689—is believed to be sound law, the world over, on the above subject.

It was written by Mr. Angell, in reviewing a decision of a Massachusetts court in 1868 that there was no cruelty because other horses of the same weight were able to draw the load in question. It was the first and last decision of the kind ever rendered in Massachusetts.

"Must an animal be worked until he breaks a blood vessel or drops dead before the law takes cognizance? Is the horse to be strained, or worked to the extreme limit of his strength, before such straining or working becomes a cruelty (that is, before the act of his master becomes 'overloading'?). Can an expert, or any number of experts, say what is the limit of strength or endurance of any horse simply by knowing his weight? It seems to me that these questions can be easily answered. Horses, like men, are of different ages, constitutions, temperaments, formation and degrees of strength. One horse, just like one man, may be twice as fast, twice as tough, twice as strong as another precisely the same weight; and inasmuch as horses, like men, are liable to a great variety of sickness, and suffer, just like men, from previous overworking and from heat, want of proper rest, food, water, shelter and care, it follows that the same horse, like the same man, may be able to perform without injury more labor in one day than another.

"Can a thousand experts prove that all men of a given weight or size are equally competent, on every day of the year, to perform a given labor? Can their testimony establish how much load a man of given weight should carry, and how far he should carry it on a given day, without regard to whether the man is old or young, sick or well, strong or weak, tough or tender, already tired or rested, full fed or starved, or the day hot or cold? And does not precisely the same reasoning apply to the horse—that what one horse can do one day has no force in showing what another ought to do on another day, unless you show the weather, age, strength, toughness and bodily condition of the two to be precisely similar? I say, then, that it is just as impossible for any number of experts, knowing only the weight or size of a horse and nothing of his age, health, strength, toughness and bodily condition, to establish what is, or is not, overloading him, as it would be, knowing only the size or weight of a man and nothing of his age, health, strength, toughness or bodily condition, to establish what is or is not an overload for him.

"How, then, are we to determine when a horse is overloaded? Just exactly and precisely as we determine when a man is overloaded. First, we are to take his own evidence. If a man stops and says, 'I am overloaded, I am working too hard, I feel that the task put upon me is too heavy,' that is evidence. So when the horse, ordinarily kind and willing to pull, comes with a heavy load to a rise of land and, after one or two efforts, stops and says, as plainly as he can speak it, 'I am overloaded, I am working too hard, I feel that the task put upon me is too heavy,' that is evidence; and there is no court or jury, or man with the heart of a man, who will not recognize it as such. Besides, the signs of overwork are just as visible in the horse as in the man. No magistrate or juror would have any difficulty in deciding in his own mind whether a case to which his attention might be attracted in our public streets was or was not a case of cruelty.

"Is not, then, the testimony of competent, intelligent and credible bystanders, who see how the horse looks and acts, and his bodily condition, health and capability to perform the labor required, the best evidence that can possibly be obtained? Where can you get better? And when disinterested and intelligent witnesses, who are present and see and hear all that is said and done in a given case, voluntarily leave their ordinary vocations and come into court to testify that they are fully satisfied that the case is a clear case of cruelty, can such evidence be overbalanced by that of any number of experts who are not present, see nothing that occurs, know nothing of the age, health, strength or bodily condition of the horse at the time, and who base their calculations simply upon the avoirdupois weight of the animal? It is perfectly evident, then, I say, that the highest and best evidence which any court or jury can ask or possibly obtain in a case of overloading, overworking or overdriving, is the evidence of the horse himself, as interpreted by those present when the cruelty is inflicted.

"Cruelty begins very far short of taking the extreme strength of the animal. God has given to men and animals an excess of strength, to be husbanded carefully and used occasionally. But to task that strength to its full limit unnecessarily is against nature, breaks down the man or the animal before his or its time, and is a cruelty against which men, having speech and reason, may protect themselves, but against which animals, having neither speech nor reason, like men, must look to them for protection."

A Weird Death Watch.

The body of Alexander M. White, the well known Philadelphian who died on Friday night on the wild mountains of North Carolina, was found strangely guarded when the dead man's friends were making search for it. Mr. White died in his saddle, and the corpse, sitting erect, was carried for some distance by the horse until an over-hanging bough brought it to the ground. Prostrate it was found by a party of mountaineers, who, to guard it safely, set a fire blazing around it. Then they went on regular guard, and so caring for the dead they were found by Mr. White's friends. Some superstitious belief had led to their performing this weird task.

In a small town in Baden a minister closed his sermon the other day with these words: "We would be pleased, moreover, to have the young man who is now standing outside the door come in and make certain whether she is here or not. That would be a great deal better than opening the door half an inch and exposing the people in the last row of seats to a draught."—Frankfurter Zeitung.

MANNERS AT TABLE.

The Time for Acquiring Them is During Childhood and at Home.

The time for acquiring good table manners is during childhood and at home. Years at boarding school, hours spent over books of social etiquette, may efface vulgar habits, but can never give the ease and grace acquired in childhood at a well ordered taole, says a writer in the American Agriculturist. A child who is almost a baby can be taught to handle his knife and fork, or spoon, if he is too young for those more advanced implements, with a daintiness that will offend no one. Where there are children, it is not a good plan to have a wide difference between your every-day and company china, silver and napery. There is too apt to be a wide difference, also, between every-day and company manners. Let each child have his cover as nicely laid with plate, knife and fork, spoon, napkin and glass as his elders, and remember that he will be sure to note your own use of these articles. Teach him to say "thank you," and "please," and if he is allowed to leave the table before the meal is ended, let him learn to say "excuse me." We were very much amused at a baby of four summers who recently dined at our table. The meal, interspersed with interesting conversation, was tedious to his infant appetite and intellect, and finally the little man spoke up with: "May I be excused, please? I have enjoyed my dinner very much" Some one at the table—not his father—remarked that that boy bid fair to be "the finest gentleman in America."

Vital Wicks.

"There are three wicks to the lamp of a man's life; brain, blood and breath." Thus writes an eminent American author. The most frequent derangements occur in the blood and in the liver, by which, when in healthy condition, the blood is purified. Look out for the terrible chain of diseases that owe their inception to torpid liver and consequent impure blood. When the symptoms of liver and kidney troubles, consumption, (Lung-Scrofula), bronchitis, and dropsy, make their appearance, the symptom is in immediate need of a course of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. Its marvelous effects have been tested and proven in the cure of tens of thousands of cases. It purifies and enriches the blood, restores lost vitality, and effectually eradicates the seeds of the worst maladies that afflict mankind.

Courtship in Greece.

When a young Greek determines to take a wife to himself he does not go a-courting, but he takes his oldest female relative into his confidence, and they at once go hunting for a suitable mate for him. Marriageable maidens are visited and silently appraised. They receive the old dames courteously, answer all their questions and never venture to ask the nature of their errand. As soon as the visitors have made a choice the wooer dispatches them again to the maiden's home with instructions to ask her hand in marriage.

In mirthful measures, warm and free,
I sing, dear maid, and sing for thee!

But I think I would be performing a greater service to you and your sex by singing, not in measured rythm but by setting out some strong truths in simple prose. If you or any of your female friends are suffering from ulcerations, displacements, bearing-down sensations, or unnatural discharges, use Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, which is sure to eradicate these complaints in a short time. It is the only medicine for women's peculiar ailments, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee, from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction in every case, or money will be refunded. This guarantee has been printed on the bottle-wrapper, and faithfully carried out for many years.

The Location of the Soul.

The soul, says Dr. A. H. Stevens, of this city, is located in the corpus callosum, a little spongy body situated at the base of the brain, which has defied the efforts of physicians in their endeavors to ascertain its uses in the human anatomy. "The corpus callosum," said the doctor, "is the seat of the imperishable mind, and it is the great reservoir and storehouse of electricity, which is abstracted from the blood in the arteries, and conveyed through the nerves up the spinal cord to the corpus callosum."—Philadelphia Inquirer.

Ills, Wills, and Pills.

An odd mixture of words, but the sufferer from constipation, indigestion, impure blood, biliousness, and other such ills, can be cured if he wills, without taking the horrid, old-fashioned pills. These are superseded in our day by those wonder, working, yet tiny, little globules, known as Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets. No griping no drastic purging; do not cause costiveness afterwards, as the old-style pills do. One little Granule a dose.

Mixed Metaphor.

An American orator at a dinner at the Grand Hotel in London recently made use of the following metaphor in his speech: "Let the Russian bear put his paw upon the fair land of Australia, and the British lion, the American eagle and the Australian kangaroo will rise up as one man and drive him ignominiously to his lair." This is almost equal to Sir Boyle Roche's best.

—How happy the young married people are, and how soon they get into trouble!

Fogg says the reason he goes out between acts at the theatre is that he may not be caught in the act.

THE WEEK, C. U. AND U. R.

Unrestricted Reciprocity and Commercial Union are both becoming but abandoned wrecks upon the shores of hard, common sense. Mr. Winam has decided that he must convince The Toronto Week of his sincerity, and has set about doing so. This he may be quite capable of doing, but when it comes to convincing The Week that sincerity and solidity of argument are one and the same thing, then he discovers the magnitude of his task. Truly, as The Week says, "There are stronger obligations than those which impel a people to seek to extend their commerce and increase their wealth. It has always seemed to us clear that it is useless to talk about Unrestricted Reciprocity between Canada and the Unites States on any other terms than those of Commercial Union. Mr. Wiman evidently does not believe it possible on easier conditions. But the dream of the Commercial Unionist is, as Mr. Wiman himself plainly states, to lift up the barbed-wire fence which now runs across the centre of the continent, separating the two nations, and to place it right around the continent,' having first made it uniform in height with that which protects the coast of the United States from foreign traffic. Not only so, but, as he also admits, the height of this fence must thereafter be regulated by the American congress, as representing the larger nation. Until, then, Mr. Wiman can persuade the Canadian people, to whose independence of spirit and thorough-going loyalty he testifies, that the latter of the two things thus involved in Commercial Union is consistent with their own self respect, and the former with their duty to the Mother Country, all purely commercial advantages will be paraded in vain." This being the case, let us examine into the matter closely and understand just what the Reform leaders have committed themselves to by embracing as their only hope the one plank of Unrestricted Reciprocity. The Week, and Mr. Wiman himself "does not believe it possible on any other terms than those of Commercial Union." Commercial Union will necessitate the regulation of Canadian fiscal matters "by the American Congress, as representing the larger nation." Could Canadians submit to this? We submit that it will be a long time ere either Mr. Wiman or the Reform leaders will succeed in educating Canadians downward to the point of sacrificing their self-respect in the manner indicated.

Dominion Parliament will open in Ottawa on January 16.

Stanley has arrived at the East African coast, and letters from him have been received in England telling of new discoveries in the interior, and proving that his enterprise has been fruitful of much good to humanity and in the addition of knowledge regarding the tribes and geography of inner Africa. The world now waits for a detailed account of his late travels.

On Monday the Governor-General signed the death warrant of Harvey, the Guelph murderer. This will be a relief to those who were afraid justice would not be allowed to take its course, and the sentimentalists who always crop up in any case of legal vindication will once more feel that they have failed. The Toronto Globe, and a large number of newspapers throughout Ontario, championed Harvey's reprieve on the ground of insanity, but their championship has been futile, and Harvey will hang in Guelph to-morrow, Nov. 29.

A Reply to "Anti-Mormon."

Editor of Flesherton "Advance."

DEAR SIR.—A clipping taken from a recent issue of your paper inviting reply to some mean, contemptible liar, who is ashamed of his lies and dodges behind a false name, thus signing a lie, makes him guilty of moral perjury. Well may he sign a false name. The very eternal fitness of things will manifest themselves in every phase of life. So of this fellow. He has been blowing for years what he would, or was going to do, if he ever met any of the Latter Day Saints, whom he calls Mormons, but who have not one point in faith or practise touching Mormonism as it is known to the world, for every fifty points where this "Anti" touches and assimilates with Mormonism.

I am not in a position to reply to what he has said, as only clippings of of your paper have been sent to me, and I cannot tell the dates of the issues except by comparisons with other items. I detest the low-bred principle of any thing calling itself a man, to say that he would undertake to correct other men's faith and claim to lay down rules as a Campbellite preacher, having the great Alexander Campbell as a demi god, or paragon of Divine perfection, and yet shrink to avow who this so-called God-sent reformer of other men's manners is. I did reply to the first tissue of lies he sent you, and I mailed my reply at Dromore, but this, like several other things, papers and letters mailed at the same office, never reached their destination. Myself and others, for years, have failed to receive communications forwarded to us, having that same office at Dromore as their destination, and we have equally failed to have matter on several occasions reach their destinations, having been mailed in Dromore. I am responsible for the statements, and if necessary can produce others who will vouch for the same. Who is responsible I know not, however I replied to "Anti's" first screed of lies, and as it never appeared in your paper, (you say it did not reach your office) I mailed it as above referred to at Dromore, and I came to the conclusion I was not to be allowed to reply—nor should I now nor at any time descend to answer a man preacher or his son, be he whom he may, but for the fact that my name is connected with it, and that, too, in such a way as to lay this villain open to an action at law for defamation of my character, and involving him in litigation with several, if not all, who may take offence as his coarse, vulgar, lies. He pretends to quote from the standard works of the L.D.S., (Church of 'Jesus Christ,") and by dropping words, and sentences and changing the meaning, he has bu-fled it very well so long as he had it all to himself. He is a garbler, in the worst sense. I could do the same thing with any book on earth, however pure, true, holy, and ennobling the sentiments of such books in their teaching might be, just let me it them as he went at the "Doctrine and Covenants" (D. C.) which is the discipline of the Church of Jesus Christ, accepted by the Latter Day Saints. and I can paint them blacker tham ink. His mean, degraded literary piracy is just the tricks of a contemptible infidel, for that is the very way they attack the Bible. They leave out words, change the meaning, put in words in brackets, etc., and a dirty mess they make of the best book on earth. "Birds of a feather."

For future convenient reference we will call this man's name Ferguson, and abbreviate by Mr. F. It will be much shorter than having to write "anti-Mormon." I have a clipping from your paper, which I think was issued near the 18th of July, '89, in which Mr. F. starts out with—"Sir—with your permission I will give your readers a short sketch of the teaching of the Mormons." If he is, as he claims to be, a minister, why not rather let him give his own teachings and put poor deluded people right and let Mormons and all others alone. I don't believe he is well enough versed to tell his own belief, let alone the faith of others. If what follows in the same letter is a sample of what the Mormons teach, then they are a much belied people, and they never knew that was their belief till this Campbellite preacher told them. He says of the Mormons "we had some of them in Balsam Valley." There may have been Mormons, Mahometans, Hindoos, etc., all there, for anything I know, and not have been made much the better for their visit, so far as Mr. F. is concerned, albeit he claims to be sent of God. He let the poor deluded Mormons go on their way to perdition, without this God-sent preacher of Campbellism ever telling them the way to eternal life. So their blood must be on his head. I believe he lied wilfully and maliciously, when he said Mormons had visited Balsam Valley, and he knew he lied. It was not the Mormons, but the "Church of Jesus Christ" of L.D.S. had a representative there by the name of Elder J. A. McIntosh, and as "Elder McIntosh" is named as the one who "began by showing that the church of Rome departed from the faith, and is the great whore and mother of harlots, and that all the other churches are harlots, and their preachers impostors, as the signs do not follow their preaching." Exactly Mr. F., dare you deny it? Rome was the one and only christian church on earth, from the time of her usurped authority till the fifteenth century, when Luther (a Roman bishop) broke away, followed by many others, such as Calvin (a Roman priest) Jerome, a Roman bishop, John Huss, another Roman priest, John Knox, another Roman priest, Henry VIII, a Roman friar, etc., etc. Therefore, Sir, as a corrupt tree cannot bring forth good fruit, you are by descent the fruit, or part of it.

If Rome was right when those men left her, then they became apostates from the true church, and cannot have any authority, as Rome claims the "keys" of Peter to bind and loose. So, sir, when those apostates left the pale of the church of Rome they were excommunicated, loosed on earth. Hence, if Rome was the continuation of the apostolic, or true church, whatever the true church loosed on earth was to be "loosed in heaven," and don't forget, Mr. F., that Calvin, Knox, came direct out of Rome, and became the fathers and founders of Calvinism, of whom the Presbyterian church, and Baptists are branches. And, Sir, don't forget that your demi-god, Alexander Campbell, was a Presbyterian, and apostatized and joined the Baptist, and apostatized from the Baptist, and started on his own hook or in company with Birtley, Rigdon, Scott, and a few other aspirants, and after first uniting in a movement called the Reformed Baptists, finally developed into the Disciples, who in turn are split in several factions—"Disciples." "Disciples of Christ." "Christian Disciples" and "Christian," all originally having one father, Mr. Campbell, who came out of the Presbyterian, who were founded by Calvin, who came out of Rome. Hence, Sir, you hold your authority away down the stream from the fountain head of the Mother, Rome. So Elder McIntosh knows just what he was saying when he was at Maple Valley, and you, Sir, imposter that you are, to dare administer a holy ordinance of God when you know you have no authority except from Rome, felt the force of the truth when Elder McIntosh preached there and it laid your daring imposition open.

God's word says in Heb. 5, No man taketh this honor unto himself but he that is called of God as was Aaron." This is in reference to the ministry, and Aaron was called by direct and immediate revelation, and through the prophet Moses. Is this the way you were called sir? No, you blaspheme and scoff at the idea of God revealing anything now. Then sir, who revealed to you that you were wanted to preach the doctrines of Camobellism? I guess that Joseph Smith had as good rights to found and organize a church as Alex. Campbell had, or Wesley, Luther, or any other man. And if he did obtain direct revelations from God to do so, he had better right than any of them, as not one of them ever laid claim to an angel coming to restore the authority Rome had so cruelly torn from them, and they, like you sir, did not lay claim to direct revelations, so that if neither angel nor revelation told them they were needed to found so many different conflicting theories, in fact never told them they were needed by God at all, then, where did they obtain authority? Rome had "loosed" them.

Oh, says the apostates, "Rome never had the power to cut us off!" Then sir, in that case she never had any power to give, for if she had power to give she had power to take away, so that if she never had power, then sir, not one of the apostate reformers who came out of Rome ever had any. You saw and felt the force of this truth, Mr. F., and it cut you to the heart, and it will stand against you despite all your malignant lies against the Latter Day Saints. You say "this is Mormon impudence for I (you) know not of any other society that the words whore, harlots and imposters will apply to, or suit better than to them." You know sir, that the dreadful whore of Rev. 17, and her daughters apply to Rome and her daughters, as she was to make all nations drunken by the filthiness of the wine of her fornication. This requires universal temporal power to effect it. Rome only held that; the L.D.S. did not. Rome was to corrupt the "kings of the earth" through her own and her daughter's teachings, and sir all the crown heads and kings of earth to-day are made drunken by their false doctrines, but not a single king of the earth is a L.D.S. Read this 17 chap. of Rev. and fit yourself into your place as a grandaughter of the old mother, you have a royal parent. God help us if Joseph Smith's claim is not a better one than the rotten, corrupt one you have. Even if I admitted him to be an imposter, still his claim would be purer than the source you hold yours from. But sir in Rev. 14, 5-7, John saw an angel come from heaven with the "everlasting Gospel" to preach to every nation, kindred, tongue and people, proving that there was not a nation, etc., on earth who had the Gospel, therefore God must send an angel back to again restore it and give men the power to preach and administer its ordinances. See also Mat. 24, 14, and Zech. 2, 1-5. Zech. tells us a "young man" was to have an angel come to him just at the time Jerusalem was to be restored and the covenant people (the Jews) restored. As an angel was to come to some young man just before the events, then, sir, Mr. Smith's claim was not an unscriptural one, even if he was not the young man, but I will show you later on that if he was not the young man, that it is too late as the time has gone by, hence the prophets would be false.

[Owing to the lengthy nature of the above communication we are obliged to hold over the balance for next week.—ED. ADVANCE.]

ADVICE TO MOTHER.—Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with pain of Cutting Teeth! If so send at once and get a bottle "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for Children Teething. Its value is incalculable. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately. Depend upon it, mothers; there no mistake about it. It cures Dysentery and Diarrhœa, regulates the Stomach and Bowels, cures Wind Colic, softens the Gums reduces Inflamation, and gives tone and energy to the whole sistem. "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for children teething is pleasant to the taste and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and is for sale by all druggists throughoutt the world. Price twenty-five cents a bottle. Be sure and ask for "MRS. WINSLOW'S SYRUP," and take no other kind.

The following is strange, but true. One morning last week, Mr. Andrew Catto, of the 7th concession Elderslie, went out to bring his cows in from the field. He found one cow separated from the others and surrounded by a number of pigs. On approaching nearer he was surprised to find three of the pigs, all of which were full grown, had one of the cow's teats in its mouth and was busily engaged in the milking process. The pigs were driven away but they had milked the cow dry.—Enterprise. This reads well as a sensational story, but do cows in your neighborhood wear three teats, Mr. Enterprise?

A. O. U. W.

On Monday evening next, December 2, Flesherton Lodge, No. 142, A.O U.W., will nominate their officers for the ensuing year. The election takes place at the following meeting. Dec. 16. WM. IRWIN, Recorder.

Entered the Ministry.

Mr. Wm. Karstedt, who has been a resident of Flesherton during the past year, and who, during that time has been prepairing himself to enter the ministry of the United Bretheren, successfully passed his third examination a couple of weeks ago, and left Flesherton last week to enter upon his new field of labor at Fonthill, Ont. We congratulate Mr. Karstedt on his triumph in the fight with more than ordinary obstacles.

The White Cross.

Mr. C.A. Dike, of Hamilton, has been in our midst during the past week in connection with the White Cross movement. At close of the Presbyterian services Sunday afternoon and the Methodist service at night, Mr. Dike gave short addresses explanatory of the objects of the society which he represents, and on Tuesday evening a lecture in the Town Hall to men only, and Wednesday afternoon in the same place to women only. Mr. Dike's object is a laudable one, and his visit here has created considerable interest in the cause which he represents.

The Little Mill.

Big repairs have been going on of late to the Little Mill. Mr. Loucks has placed therein a double set of Ansonia rolls, a double set of scalpers, and a Dobson improved flower dresser, which will now enable him to turn out flour equal in quality to any roller flour, and better for general farmers' use. He can also grind much faster than by stone alone. With the present system he uses both stone and rolls, and the flour is of beautiful texture. The mill is now running to its fullest capacity and such is its good name that farmers from Walters' Falls visited it this week to get their gristing done. Pliny Loucks is a genial little gentleman, a good miller, and we are happy to chronicle his success.

From The Station.

To the Editor of The Advance.

Sir,—The inhabitants of the Station are waiting patiently for the return of your correspondent of this place, as they think his stay in the country is somewhat prolonged. I wish you would stir him up with a long pole.

By the way I would just state there is expected to be quite a boom in the line of trade and commerce here this winter.

Ever onward. Mr. A. Hannah, our energetic townsman, is still to the front as he has opened out a new store, and is bound to supply the wants of the public from a needle to an anchor.

I was sorry to learn that Mr. Hogg, our popular merchant, is leaving us, but wish him every success in his new sphere.

Fisk Jubilee Singers.

The world-renowned Fisk Jubilee singers, of Tennessee, will be with us on Monday evening next, under the auspices of the Flesherton I.O.O.F. The members of this society are worthy of much praise for securing this grand company for an entertainment here, and will no doubt, as they well deserve, be fully recompensed by the large number who will listen to the strains of the sweet singers from Tennessee. It is seldom that Flesherton is visited with talent of this order, and they should be met with a packed house. The company sang in Toronto on Monday evening last.

The Globe of Wednesday says: Again last night in the Elm Street Methodist church the famous original Tennessean Jubilee Singers, under the management of Mr. R. W Thomas, appeared. The program, as on the night previous, was full of soul-stirring pieces, consisting of solos, quartets and choruses. Miss Jennie Gatewood again scored a great success as a soloist. The sweet singing of Miss Lulu Canaan was warmly received. Mr. Will H. Thompson, the wonderful deep basso profundo, sang as though his whole soul were in it, "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep," to the intense delight of the audience.

When Baby was sick, we gave her Castoria.
When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria.
When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria.
When she had Children, she gave them Castoria

THE CRONIN TRIAL.

The Case for the State Closed—The Defence Not Ready.

A CANADIAN DOCTOR'S STORY.

At the opening of the Cronin trial to-day Judge McConnell announced his decision on the question of going into the past history of the Clan-na-Gael. The last witness on the stand yesterday was ex-Policeman Brown. He is also an ex-member of the Clan-na-Gael. He was asked whether he had preferred charges against Dr. Cronin in 1885, the State Attorney explaining that he proposed to show by witnesses that this was a fact, that Dan. Coughlin was a member of the Trial Committee and that Dr. Cronin was expelled from the organization. The logical consequence of the admission of this testimony was a complete investigation of the Clan-na-Gael, at least so far as it could be made to show cause for animosity against Dr. Cronin on the part of the prisoners at the bar. This offer led to the most earnest and protracted argument between the counsel that has yet taken place. Judge McConnell held that the evidence sought to be elicited from Officer Brown on the points named was incompetent and ruled it out.

THE DEFENCE NOT READY.

The lawyers for the defence asked until Monday to prepare their case, but the court allowed them two days, and the trial was adjourned until Saturday morning.

After Clancey's evidence is heard the defence will be called on to begin their case, which is expected to occupy at least two weeks. The reason why witnesses were not called to show the existence of a conspiracy after the murder to brand Cronin as a British spy, who had gone secretly to England to testify as LeCaron did, was that such evidence would be inadmissable as against the defendants on trial.

IS COONEY IN CHICAGO?

A new and startling phase was given to the Cronin murder to-day by Doctor Peter J. Coss, a former resident of Canada. He was employed by the Canadian Government some years ago, being stationed in Chicago and Buffalo to watch the movements of the Fenians. But in reality Dr. Coss was a Clan-na-Gael spy who succeeded in getting into the secret service of the Canadian Government by a shrewd device. He kept the Clan-na-Gaels posted how they could best carry on their active campaign against England in Canada. He went to Ottawa, Ont., as the agent of Clan-na-Gael conspirators who had laid plans to blow up Rideau Hall, the vice-regal residence, with dynamite and level the Parliament and departmental buildings to the ground. The plot was discovered and Dr. Cross arrested on his arrival in Ottawa. He was released, but soon afterwards shot and killed a man named Hamilton, for which he served a term of fourteen months in prison. He claims to have been in New York at the time of the Cronin murder, but admits he knows intimately all the men on trial, also "J. B Simonds" and Patrick Cooney. He declares the police do not want Cooney, whom he laims to have seen three weeks ago in a Joliet saloon. He accuses Cronin of being an informer in the British service, and says that Cronin was killed by men from Galway county, Ireland, in revenge for Cronin's alleged betrayal of Drs. Cunningham and Gallagher, now in British prisons. He says he offered to produce Cooney and Simonds, but neither the police nor the State's Attorney wanted them.

KUNZE'S "CONFESSION."

Kunze has been reading the papers, and objects to the published statement that he is going to confess. He has addressed a letter to the Abend Post, of this city, giving what he says is all he knows about the Cronin case. The story is interesting, outlining, as it does, the defence to be made in his case, and the explanation that will be made of his living under an assumed name. The little German declares his belief in Burke's guilt, and says he has been promised his freedom by Judge Longenecker if he will turn State's evidence. Below is the letter translated:

MY CONFESSION.

It surprised me very much when I read in the papers yesterday that I was to go on the stand as a witness for the State's Attorney. What have I to tell the State's Attorney? I could tell him nothing unless I told him a fairy tale whereby innocent persons would suffer. If I had heard a word about it before I would have told long ago. If I had taken Dan Coughlin to the Carlson cottage it would have been told long ago. I would have told it when they kept me in the police station for ten days. I never used Dan Coughlin's buggy and cannot, therefore, give false testimony, although Mr. Longenecker promised me my liberty if I would say so. Oh, how gladly would I take my liberty if I knew something of the story and could say so to the State's Attorney. But I will not swear falsely for any money in the world, not even if my life is in peril could I see an innocent person suffer on account of me. That I ran around with Dan Coughlan until April 10th, 1889, is true, and that I bore a false name on the South side is also true but all this I have already confessed to the State's Attorney. That the others had something to do with this (Cronin) matter I now believe myself if for no other reason than because of their behaviour in jail. I am sure that Burke is one of the miscreants. I saw and felt it yesterday. When the clothes of Dr. Cronin were brought into the court-room he trembled violently, which is a proof of his guilt. The others were as white as snow. I thank God that I have a clear conscience; have nobody to fear, and nothing to make me tremble. So far as my false name is concerned, that will be cleared up by the Shufeldt distillery matter, because I was shadowed at that time, and they wanted to take important papers from me.

This is my confession which I have to make to Mr. Longenecker. In the honest hope that my innocence and the truth will soon be known, I remain, yours sincerely,

JOHN P. KUNZE.

THE LINE OF DEFENCE.

The alibi method of defence will be resorted to in the case of Kunze, Coughlin and O'Sullivan. The evidence of Niemann, who saw the three defendants in his saloon near the Carlson cottage an hour after the murder, and the story of Mrs. Hoertel, the washwoman who heard the death struggle and cries in the cottage, will be impeached by the defence. It is understood that one of the witnesses for Coughlin will be a man from Hancock, Mich., who will swear to being "James Smith," for whom the detective hired the white horse and buggy. Great stress will be laid on the fact that when Dinan's rig was first taken to Mrs. Conklin she declared it was not the one which took the doctor away. Only a show of defence will be made by John F. Beggs, who feels secure in the belief that the State has not made out a case against him. Kunze is not so confident of acquittal, and will have several witnesses to swear to his being at work and on the South side on the day and night of the murder.

THE STATE HAS OTHER WITNESSES.

In addition to James Clancy, the New York reporter, the State intends to have another witness on hand on Saturday before the close of their case. He is E. C. Dodge, now a resident of Washington, who overheard a damaging conversation between Beggs and Coughlin on the street last April. Doctor Cronin was driving by when Coughlin said: "There he goes. He ought to be killed before he gets many more buggy rides." "Hush," said Beggs, "some one might hear you."

The police would like to see Jerry McDonald, who is believed to be in County Cork, Ireland. He lived in a Lake View shanty with his wife prior to the murder, but left for Europe in May. His picture has been identified as that of a man who received constant visits from Cooney, Coughlin and Burke just before the murder, and the police more than suspect he had a hand in it. He will be extradited if the evidence warrants such action.

A new witness for the State has turned up in Charles H. Hartwick, a Lakeview Justice of the Peace, who overheard Coughlin say to the men working under his orders on the sewers and catch basins to find the doctor's body, "It's no use going any further. The body isn't around these parts." This incident occurred when the workmen had searched within a block of Evanston avenue and 59th street, where the body was found.

The lawyers for Beggs were undecided to day whether to risk a motion for his discharge to-morrow. Though they maintain that the State has made out no case against Beggs, they fear the effect which a denial of their motion to discharge would have upon the jury.

Frank Woodruff, the inventor of the confessions, is incensed at the State Attorney not using him as a witness against his fellow-defendants, and intimated to-day that he would not go to the stand now under any consideration. The State does not want any conditional confession from any of the men on trial, but a "squeal" from one of the five men—Beggs excepted—is not an unlikely thing after the jury's verdict has been announced.

The defence will make a vigorous onslaught upon Mrs Hoertel's testimony, as it is the only positive evidence going to show that the doctor was murdered on May 4th in the Carlson cottage. The prosecution have held back a couple of good witnesses for their case in rebuttal, who will corroborate to some extent the story told by Mrs. Hoertel.

AN AUSTRIAN PATRIOT'S DEATH.

Strangled by Attendants Who Plundered His Effects.

A Vienna cable says: The preliminary investigation into the Carlowitz scandal, in which a large number of persons, many of them of high social standing, are charged with stealing or receiving the property of the late Patriarch Angyelich, has brought to light some highly sensational disclosures. Szavich, the chief offender, and valet of the late patriarch, now states that the latter did not die a natural death, but was strangled. Those implicated in the robberies being afraid that if the patriarch lingered long he would be visited by sympathetic friends, whose calls might interfere with the scheme of plunder, they therefore strangled him one evening, although who actually committed the crime is not stated. Another circumstance of a startling character that has come to light is that the brother of the patriarch is gravely compromised in the affair.

FOUR WILL DIE.

A Mass of Coal Buries Four Men in a Burning Mine.

A Pottsville, Pa., despatch says: At Middle Creek colliery, near Tremont, is one of the most gaseous mines in the Schuylkill region. A blast fired in a breast yesterday cut and ignited a leader, and this fired a large quantity of loose coal lying in the breast and threatened the destruction of the mine. Fifteen men were put to work last night to extinguish the flames. Early this morning a mass of coal fell, burying four of them at the face of the burning breast. The remaining eleven worked heroically to rescue their comrades, and although several were overcome by gas, they continued at work until reinforcements arrived. The men who were buried were found alive, but so badly burned and injured that they cannot recover.

A Murderer Frustrated.

A Birmingham, Ala., despatch of Sunday says: While a party of whites were passing along the road near Smithville yesterday morning they heard loud screams in a female voice issuing from the adjacent wood. Approaching they saw a negro man in the act of hanging a naked negro woman. He had a rope around her neck, and was drawing her up to the limb. The negro fled, and the woman said Richard Henderson, her husband, had a lock of his paramour's hair which she had found and burned. This enraged him. He first beat her, then took her to the woods, stripped her, and whipped her with switches till she was a mass of raw flesh, and was then about to hang her. Richard was caught and placed in jail.

A Step Forward in Co-Education.

A Philadelphia despatch of Tuesday says: The trustees of the University of Pennsylvania to-day adopted the co-education system in a modified form. Prof. Edward D. Cope, the famous geologist, was elected to take the chair of geology, and three women were elected as managers of the University Hospital. The move toward co-education was the acceptance of an offer of Mr. Joseph M. Bennet to donate properties adjoining the university for a college for women.

The pretty daughter of John T. Lester, a Chicago millionaire, has eloped with young Phil Armour, of the same city.

Sir Charles Russell, the English barrister, makes more money than any other lawyer in the world. He lives well, works hard and still rejoices in the fact that he is comparatively a young man.

THE ALTON CALAMITY.

The Terrible Visitation of a Peaceful Ontario Village.

FULL ACCOUNT OF THE CATASTROPHE.

The following despatch from the village of Alton gives full particulars of the bursting of the dam and devastation and loss of life brought by the rushing waters:

It is said to have been just about 3 30 yesterday morning when the water in McClelland Bros'. mill dam succeeded in breaking its bounds. This dam has been for some time considered unsafe, and twice during the past year gave trouble by breaking away. The immediate cause of the disaster was the breaking of the upright centre post of the waste weir. The centre post being the key of the whole structure, the tenant or cross bar was knocked off, all the posts were levelled in a moment, a body of water sixteen feet deep was at once released, and the whole seven acres of water contained in the dam dashed down the valley. Had there been no other dams, the loss would have been trivial, but as the water rushed down the incline it carried off dam after dam, each increasing the fury of the torrent, until it passed beyond and found an outlet in the wide bed of the river at the Forks. Below Mr. McClelland's the torrent launched itself into the dam of Mr. B. Ward, where the Alton Knitting Mill, employing some thirty hands, was operated, and in a few minutes waste weir No. 2 was forced out, releasing five acres more of water, with a fall of twenty feet. The next dam was an unoccupied power, owned by Mr. W. McClelland, and in the twinkling of an eye it was gone. The rolling mass roon reached mill pond No. 4, owned by Mr. Wm. Algie, where the stream is used in operating the Beaver Knitting Mills, a large stone factory affording employment for thirty-five persons. The waste weir of Mr. Algie's dam was more strongly built than any of the others, and it is to this fact that many of the inhabitants

OWE THEIR LIVES.

The weir bravely held its own against the force of the water, and restrained it for nearly half an hour, the torrent only escaping after cutting through a six-foot embankment for a distance of sixty feet. Mr. Algie's mill was completely gutted, the foundations being sapped, and all the machinery twisted and dashed out of shape. It might be stated here in passing that in the vicinity of Mr. Algie's mill there six feet of earth piled up by the flood, and an immense boulder weighing over three tons was carried from the vicinity of the dam to the back of the mill, a distance of over fifty yards. An iron dye kettle, weighing a ton and a half, was also playfully lifted by the current and deposited further down the valley.

The next dam on the stream was No. 5, that of Mr. Alex. Dick, of the Dominion Foundry. One side of the foundry, a large, two story structure, built of stone, was undermined and fell with a crash into the river. Strange to relate, the moulding shop of the foundry, a one-story stone building standing more directly in the way of the rushing waters, thirty by forty feet in size, melted like snow in June, and patterns, pig iron and cupola went rushing down the street. The stones of the building are everywhere below the foundry, but not one of them rests on the other. Frederick Hill's brick dwelling came next, and although the house was fifteen feet from the level of the stream, it did not escape. All the outhouses, sheds and fences were whisked away, and an immense beam stolen from one of the mills was dashed through the stone foundation of the house. Mrs. Read, who lives near Mr. Hill, was also made to suffer in a similar manner, her house being badly damaged and her shed and other buildings carried off. Mill pond No. 6, owned by Mr. R. Meek, of the Alton Flour Mills, was the next to crumble, and there is scarcely a vestige of the one-time dam, although the building was not hurt to any extent, the chief injury being to the stock, which was entirely spoiled.

THE SCENE OF DEATH.

In the valley below Meek's dam there were three small frame houses standing. The first was occupied by Mr. and Mrs. John Harris, the second by Thomas Whetham, his wife and two children, and the third was an empty building owned by Henry Newman and occupied by the Orange Lodge. The water filled these houses almost to the ceiling, and lifted and carried them away from their location. The house occupied by the aged Harris couple was torn into atoms, the doors, windows, floor and roof being wrenched apart and scattered like so many shavings. Both occupants were killed. The body of Mr. Harris was found at 8 o'clock one hundred yards from where his house had stood and almost buried in the debris. The remains of Mrs. Harris have not yet been recovered, though large bodies of searchers have been diligently at work in the ruins all day. Mr. Harris was a retired wood turner and had reached the venerable age of over 80 years. He has been living in the district nearly all his life and was one of the pioneers of Alton. Mrs. Harris was 70 years of age. They were well known to everybody within ten miles and were highly respected. They have two sons residing here—Thomas, whose stave factory was badly injured by the washout, and Samuel, who is also connected with the stave factory. A third son, named Edward, resides in Cheltenham, and a daughter, Mrs. Galloway, is now living in Guelph.

A THRILLING EXPERIENCE.

The experience of Thomas Whetham, Mr. Harris' next door neighbor, was a thrilling one, and his escape is regarded as almost miraculous. He and his wife and 2-year-old child were asleep when the water came upon them. Before he had time to think they were all awakened and found themselves struggling in the water. He seized his little girl with his left arm, and with his right grasped the top of the half-open door. His wife clung to the bed, and, at his suggestion, got on top of it. The water rose to the height of eight feet, and carried the bed with it, until Mrs. Whetham was touching the ceiling, there remaining only space enough to provide air. Mr. Whetham found that his body was easily held up by the water, and though he had no footrest did not find the strain too great. He was nearly giving up in despair, however, when he heard Peter Lemon, who lives on the hill near by, call out to him to keep up, as the water was going down. In a short time—about ten minutes altogether, but an age to him—the water lowered, and they were on terra firma, or what was nearly as good just then, in about two or three feet of mud washed in by the current. Meanwhile what had become of the four-months-old baby girl that had been sleeping peacefully in its cradle? Both father and mother had given it up as lost forever, but after a quick search they found it, almost buried in mud, in one corner, gasping, but still alive. All four were looked after by the neighbors, and, under Dr. James Algie's care, the mother and infant, who were very low, were brought round again. The third building, in which the Orange Lodge was wont to gather, was completely demolished, and after much searching the flag pole, minus its flowing silken banner, and the head of the drum were unearthed from the chaos. Next in the course of destruction came known as McKinnon's dam, where a flour mill owned by W. D. Mathews & Co., of Toronto, and leased by Messrs. Stark Bros., is situated. The machinery is injured, but as there was very little stock the damage in this respect was small. Having reached the last dam on this section of the river, the torrent soon spent its fury. The chief damage southeast of the village is to the gravel road from the village to the station. It has been washed away for some distance, and the 'bus man has been compelled to tie up his horses for the present. For over a mile below the village the valley is strewn with rubbish, lumber, household goods, stones, etc., the heterogeneous mass reaching at places a height of 15 or 20 feet. It will take weeks to clear this away, and it will be years before the valley will lose all traces of the present washout. That part of the village lying along the valley presents an appearance of desolation that only a flood could produce. Sidewalks are gone; roads are washed into hills and dales; the subsoil is swept away in many places, and boulders and smaller stones laid bare. The material taken from the dams is piled up in other localities. Sections of houses and odd articles lie everywhere, and, to sum up, the spectacle is one of which a magician might be proud. People who have lived here all their lives look around them in wonder and try to imagine that the valley was once fair and that they are not dreaming when they look at its present condition. Fortunately no live stock was lost, though in several cases horses were up to their ears in water, and pigs and other animals were floated along for distances of fifty to one hundred yards. One little fellow remarked to the reporter that the funniest sight he ever saw was a lot of hens floating down the stream. In addition to three of the village bridges, the railway bridge on the Credit Valley division of the C. P. R. was wrecked, all the supports being carried away. The stringers kept their places, however, and some temporary posts were put under them. During the day travellers were transferred across the valley on a hand-car, and a gang of men are working all night repairing all the damage. Regular traffic will be resumed within 24 hours.

MILL POND NO. 7,

THE LOSSES.

The total loss is thought to be in the neighborhood of $25,000. The municipality loses heavily in the shape of public works, and the private losses range from $5,000 downwards. A regrettable feature of the disaster is that there is not one cent of insurance, damages from water not being generally insurable.

Five Killed and Many Injured.

A Butte, Mont., despatch says: News was received here to-day of a bad accident on the construction branch of the Northern Pacific, fifteen miles east of here, in Jefferson county, on Tuesday night. The men employed on Tewey's contract were in the cut blasting rock. A blast of giant powder was fired, but failed to have the desired effect. It being close to quitting time, and the men being anxious to complete the blast before they quit, they poured in black powder. Some sparks from the giant powder blast must have remained in the hole, for instantly an explosion followed. Con. Sullivan, the foreman; John Dell, A. Finn, A. W. Larson, T. O'Leary and Ham Ross were killed, and two others had their eyes blown out. The coroner's jury rendered a verdict of accidental death, the men being themselves to blame.

Frightful Death from Rabies.

A Philadelphia despatch of Sunday says: About nine months ago Daniel J. Farrel, 28 years old, employed at Point Breeze Gas Works, was bitten on the little finger of the left hand by a mongrel cur that hung around the works. The wound was cauterized at the time and apparently healed. When Farrell returned from work a week ago he complained of a strange feeling. On Wednesday a physician was summoned. Within a few hours thereafter the patient had an attack of rabies, and the convulsions continued at short intervals until to-day, when his sufferings ended in death.

Style for the Street.

One of the handsomest street dresses shown this season is of golden-brown crepon, over striped moire of the same color. The back of the skirt, which is full and straight, is of the crepon, and the petticoat is of the striped material, two long tabs extending down the sides, finished at the bottom by deep scallops, under which is placed a knotted silk fringe. The basque is also scalloped around the edge, with a vest front of the crepon. The close sleeves have tiny scallops at the wrist, and an epaulet of fringe at the shoulder.

Didn't Know Much.

"Doctah told me that I must not walk wapidly or dwink ice watah," said Gus De Joy confidingly to Miss Pepperton.

"Did he?"

"Ya as; he said I might get congestion of the bwain, you know."

"Dear me! How little these doctors seem to know!"

Mother—Tommy, I hear you got a thrashing in school to day. Tommy—Yes, ma, the teacher whipped me, but he is getting so old and weak that it didn't hurt much. "Did you cry?" "Oh, yes, I bawled so you could have heard it on the next block." "Why did you do that?" "I wanted to make the old man feel happy once more."

"FATHER" CARSON.

Rev. Mr. Carson's glowing Tribute to the Jesuits.

A Kingston despatch says: At the closing evangelistic meetings of Messrs. Crossley and Hunter the Rev. W. W. Carson lately of Dominion Church Ottawa, created a genuine sensation by his remarks. Every minister was requested to speak for a certain religious denomination and Mr. Carson was called upon to represent the Roman Catholics. He was introduced as "Father" Carson and said that Mr. Hunter in calling him had recovered his sanity, if at the opening of the meeting he had lost it. He (the speaker) belonged to the Holy Catholic Church. He lived in communion with the saints. He had received the forgiveness of sins. He had, through Christ, the hope of life everlasting. After all there was much they could learn profitably from the great Roman Catholic Church. If they wanted missionaries to undertake difficult fields they could present no more devoted men than the seraphic Jesuits, often condemned in these days. If the smallpox broke out in the city they would want some one to care for these patients in the hospitals. They would have had better experience than he had in Ottawa if they did not ask the assistance of the sisters of charity, possessed of a spirit of love as immaculate as the mother of the Nazarene, who, with their lives in their hands, will imperil themselves in waiting upon the afflicted. If they wanted a shaft to pierce into this world's lazarettos they would have to go to a Father Damien. If they wanted to learn absolute respect for authority this lesson will be spelled out for them in places like the Roman Catholic churches. He reverenced her laws. He read her history with inspiration. Some of her priests were amongst his most personal friends. He took it as the greatest favor they could confer upon him to represent the Roman Catholic Church. He reverenced that Christian Church. If he had doubts of the apostolic succession in the Anglican Church he had no doubts of that of the Roman Catholic Church. He asserted there was no religious denomination with a broader or more minute theology than had the Roman Catholic Church. He hoped that the meetings which were concluding would be a prophecy of the ultimate unity of Protestants. He hoped he would live to see the day when the denominations separated now by some ecclesiastical technicalities will be united, and when all will belong to one Christian assembly to assist in spreading the love of the Lord Jesus Christ. He announced the collection as $457, and spoke in flattering terms of the evangelists. He then intimated there was no man, Protestant or Roman Catholic, who stood on a broader platform of Christian fellowship than he did. God had given him a nature to sympathize with every man. With all the fervor of his nature he believed in God and from the depths of his soul he believed in man. That was the beginning and end of his theology.

THE CHURCH MILITANT.

African Missionaries Fighting the Ara Slave Dealers.

A London cable says: News received from the African great lakes shows that the missionaries are now members of the church militant, and are in a state of open war with the Arab slave catchers. A letter from the Rev. Mr. Wright, who is at Fwambo, on Lake Tanganyika, says the missionaries there were daily expecting an attack from the Arabs. The Tanganyika missionaries have endeavored to avoid any quarrel with the Arabs, who, however, seem determined to avenge themselves upon the white men there because the missionaries at Lake Nyassa are trying to put a stop to slave raids. So the whites at Fwambo have been compelled to build a fort, have surrounded it with a strong abattis of thorny trees and wire entanglement, and scattered broken bottles over the ground to interfere with any attempt by these barefooted enemies to take the place by storm. This is hardly what the missionaries were sent to Africa to do, but they are compelled in self-defence to prepare themselves for the worst. Meanwhile the missionaries at the north end of Lake Nyassa are kept busy fighting slave-raiding parties. The Arabs are constantly making detours around the mission stations to attack native villages for no other purpose than to make slaves of the women and children. The Rev. Mr. Cross writes that the Arabs, well supplied with bark ropes to tie their captives, surround the villages at early dawn and fire into the huts. The terrified natives, who have no weapons except spears, rush for their lives. Many of the men are shot down and the women and children are captured. The missionaries are taking the part of all these natives, and when they hear of a slave raid they send out parties from the fortified stations to attack the murderers and release the captives. On one occasion in July last they killed all the Arabs in a raiding party, and released a long string of women and children who were tied together with ropes around their necks. These rescues, however, cannot restore the ruined homes and murdered friends of the victims, and terrible misery prevails. The missionaries are very indignant to find that the guns they capture from the Arabs are of English make, and they long for the day when Governments will refuse to put instruments of destruction in the hands of murderous Arabs.

Blue Comes Back.

Many years have passed away since sky blue was so much worn as it is now. The present shade is a very silvery one and is usually combined with black. A broad-brimmed, low-crowned black felt hat, turned up slightly at the back so as to show the hair, is trimmed with a long piece of ribbon velvet of this special blue, made up in two bows, but not disconnected, a smallish one in front and a larger bow with stand-up loops behind it, both nestling up close to the crown. This combination is sure to be popular on our side of the silver streak, for there is no color more becoming to the milk-and-roses complexion of English girls and women than sky blue.—London paper.

acles rattle. She could scarcely support herself under it.

"Do I——" she said. "Am I to understand that Mr. Francis Barold does not meet with your approval?"

Mr. Binnie struck his stick sharply upon the floor of the carriage.

"Yes, by George!" he said. "I'll have nothing to do with chaps like that. If she'd taken up with him, she'd never have heard from me again. Make sure of that."

When they reached Oldclough, her ladyship followed Lucia to her room. She stood before her, arranging the manacles on her wrists, nervously.

"I begin to understand now," she said. "I find I was mistaken in my impressions of Mr. Dugald Binnie's tastes—and in my impressions of you. You are to marry Mr. Burmistone. My rule is over. Permit me to congratulate you."

The tears rose to Lucia's eyes.

"Grandmamma," she said, her voice soft and broken, "I think I should have been more frank, if—if you had been kinder, sometimes."

"I have done my duty by you," said my lady.

Lucia looked at her, pathetically.

"I have been ashamed to keep things from you," she hesitated. "And I have often told myself that—that it was sly to do it—but I could not help it."

"I trust," said my lady, "that you will be more candid with Mr. Burmistone."

Lucia blushed guiltily.

"I—think I shall, grandmamma," she said.

I was the Reverend Alfred Poppleton who assisted the rector of St. James to marry Jack Belasys and Octavia Bassett; and it was observed that he was almost as pale as his surplice.

Slowbridge had never seen such a wedding, or such a bride as Octavia. It was never admitted that Jack Belasys was a singularly handsome fellow, and had a dashing adventurous air, which carried all before it. There was a rumor that he owned silver mines himself, and had even done something in diamonds, in Brazil, where he had spent the last two years. At all events, it was ascertained beyond doubt that, being at last a married woman, and entitled to splendors of the kind, Octavia would not lack them. Her present to Lucia, who was one of the bridesmaids, dazzled all beholders.

When she was borne away by the train, with her father, and husband, and Miss Belinda, whose bonnet-strings were bedewed with tears, the Reverend Alfred Poppleton was the last man who shook hands with her. he held in his hand a large bouquet, which Octavia herself had given him out of her abundance. "Slowbridge will miss you, Miss—Mrs. Belasys," he faltered. "I—I shall miss you. Perhaps, we—may even meet again. I have thought that, perhaps, I should like to go to America."

And as the train puffed out of the station and disappeared, he stood motionless for several seconds; and a large and brilliant drop of moisture appeared on the calyx of the lily which formed the center-piece of his bouquet.

THE END.

A Romantic Story.

At the regular monthly meeting of the directors of the Montreal Society for the Protection of Women and Children yesterday the Secretary's monthly report contained a recital of a number of cases in which destitute or oppressed females had been relieved and protected by the society. One case in which the society had most beneficially interfered was somewhat romantic. Some time ago a young woman came to the Secretary and stated that she had been betrayed under promise of marriage, which her betrayer refused to fulfil. On inquiry it was learned that the young man had acknowledged this to an Anglican clergyman in the city. On the advice of the society's counsel the young man was arrested and placed in jail. It appeared that $25,000 was coming to him in England under a will, provided his widowed mother remarried. This she had done, and having become entitled to the fortune he consented to marry the girl. He was released, a license and ring procured, and having settled $15,000 on his bride they were married and are now living happily together. The report also stated that it was through the instrumentality of Mr. Wm. Darling, Mr. Barnard and the Secretary that Vaughan, alias Melbourne, had been arrested. Mr. Darling had raised about one hundred dollars for carrying on the prosecution.

DISPERSED FIGHTING.

The Idea Gaining Ground that the Method is Doomed.

The real truth of the matter was this, says the St. James Gazette, London, the German and Prussian armies, both in 1866 and 1870, were deficient in war seasoned regimental officers. They were led into action at the commencement of the war in formations from which the common sense of the intelligent rank and file revolted, and the discipline under fire was not strong enough to prevent them actually disbanding under fire and submitting to a species of "survival of the fittest" sifting—the bravest going to the front in order individually to get to their enemies, the less brave hanging back to see what would happen, and the curs slinking off to the rear, as they always do. Under like conditions the same thing had happened 60 years or more before in the French army; and, indeed, it was in this way that the idea of the present style of fighting, which many believe to be a modern invention, was first introduced. But it is interesting to note that the same conditions of the battlefield did not have the same effect on our own troops, who had been trained up to fight in line and under an iron discipline in which any attempt at cowardice was ruthlessly punished. It is, therefore, fair to assume that it would not have occurred to our troops even had they been exposed to the same ordeal as the Germans in 1870; for the fighting discipline of our old long service army was of a far higher order, and the spirit of the line formation in which it had been trained was entirely opposed to this opening out. We do not, of course, wish to be understood as advocating the wooden, senseless style of fine tactics which then obtained in our army as a model. Far from it. We should have had some pretty stern lessons, too, had we been compelled to take the field. But the essence of the idea is that, starting from the tradition of the line as a basis, we should have adapted ourselves far more readily to the changed conditions than the Germans did. The proof of the correctness of our idea is that the Germans themselves are every year coming round more and more to think that the present order of dispersed fighting is doomed, and that before long its place will have to be taken by something embodying the chief element of line fighting, namely, a line of groups in close order and single rank, closing in constantly to the centre as casualties occur. Everything tends to show that, in spite of mechanical inventions the material losses in battles are becoming less and less; but the moral stress is also shown to be increasing, and that in direct proportion to the length of time during which men are kept under fire. Therefore, the main point to be considered is not how to avoid material losses no greater than those which our forefathers faced bravely enough half a century ago, but how to maintain the moral courage of the men at its highest. Experience has abundantly shown that for this purpose nothing like close order, shoulder to shoulder in line, has ever yet been invented.

Freedom of Dundee to Lord Lorne.

On the 24th ult., the Marquis of Lorne was presented with the freedom of Dundee in the Albert Hall there. Provost Hunter presided, and there was a brilliant gathering of county gentlemen and citizens, including Lord Camperdown, Lord Airlie, Lord Strathmore, etc. In presenting the casket containing the freedom, Provost Hunter said that some time ago the Queen had raised the good old town to the dignity of a city, and they proposed to enrol the Marquis of Lorne as the first burgess under the new charter. In his reply the Marquis alluded to the ancient connection of the Argyll family with Dundee, which extended back for six centuries. He referrd to the fact that Sir Niel Campbell of Lochawe was the schoolmate of Sir William Wallace at the burgh school of Dundee, and said that to the martial feats of these two leaders Scotland was largely indebted for her independence. He expressed himself as anxious to be as worthy a burgess of the important city as his ancestors had been.

A Sweet Proposal.

"The sweetest proposal ever dreamed of," said Eli Perkins, "I think is from Austin Dobson."

"May I call you Paula?" he asked modestly.

"Yes," she said faintly.

"Dear Paula—may I call you that?"

"I suppose so."

"Do you know I love you?"

"Yes."

"And shall I love you always?"

"If you wish to."

"And will you love me?"

Paula did not reply.

"Will you, Paula?" he repeated.

"You may love me," she said again.

"But don't you love me in return?"

"I love you to love me."

"Won't you say anything more explicit?"

"I would rather not."

They were married and happy within three months.—Exchange.

Lawyer Quackenbos Says

Having no correspondent at a certain town in Pennsylvania, I wrote to the postmaster of the town there, asking him to give me the address of a reputable lawyer to whom I might address myself. The answer came back as follows:

FIGHTING DISEASE.

A University Professor's Surprising Discovery.

Consumption of the lungs, that dread disease which has long fought humanity to the death, may be the next to yield up its fatal sway before the march of medical research. Professor Samuel G. Dixon, of the University of Pennsylvania, has recently made a discovery within the realm of bacteriology which, it is thought, will revolutionize the fight against the disease. It is the bacillus tuberculosis which consumes the lungs in the dreaded phthisis, and it is in the study of this animal organism that Professor Dixon has gained such a signal triumph.

During the past summer Professor Dixon was in England, and, while pursuing medical research there, he decided to experiment in bacteriology. It has long been one of the teachings of that science, supported by Dr. Koch, of Berlin, one of the most eminent students, that the bacilli never undergo any change under varying conditions. According to this theory there are various bacilli—one appearing in consumption, another in leprosy, another in anthrax, and each having a distinct, unvarying species. Dr. Dixon, however, found that this was not the case. Taking the virulent bacilli, which, in the human lungs, would speedily bring death, the Professor bred from them new bacilli. But in the breeding process, he, so to speak, starved or devitalized the growing organism. He introduced conditions unfavorable to full development. Great was his surprise on discovering that the newly bred bacillus, instead of resembling the virulent original, according to the Koch theory, was of an entirely different form. It was, as Dr. Dixon believed, the bacillus tuberculosis deprived of its virulence, and on the truth of this theory rests the discoverer's hopes. In the mere refutation, however, of Dr. Koch's thesis, bacteriological science has been revolutionized.

Once sure of his discovery Dr. Dixon began experiments with his new bacillus shorn of virulence. As he reasoned, this organism, though bred from a fatal type, would not prove fatal if inoculated into the human system. Guinea pigs and rabbits were inoculated one month ago. Yesterday they were strong and free from disease of any kind. Then taking the animals thus harmlessly inoculated he injected the virulent bacillus which under ordinary conditions would speedily cause death. The animals are still strong and well, and the doctor's theories have as yet proven correct.

This, then, will be the new preventive of consumption. As the human being by vaccination is secured from small-pox, so by inoculation with harmless bacilli the terrors of consumption will be warded off. The human tissues will be so treated that the virulent type of bacillus cannot exist. Indeed, so far-reaching may be the effects of the discovery that even after consumption has begun the fatal organisms may be deprived of their virulence and the disease thus stayed. It is believed that other bacillic diseases as well as consumption may be similarly treated.

Mr. Dixon is slow to say that he has discovered a preventive of consumption, but he is inclined to believe that his present investigations will prove that his theories are correct.—Philadelphia Record.

Underground Wires Abroad.

There seems to be no difficulty in the management of underground electrical wires in France, Germany or England. The Pall Mall Gazette gives the following description of a safe underground device: "The mains are in twenty feet lengths. The largest is 2¼ inches over all, and the smallest 1¼ inches. There is no cable. First is a tube of copper having a quarter of an inch of sectional area, through which the current is sent out. This has a cover of insulating material, and a second copper tube is compressed round that for the return current. Another thin layer of insulating material is used, and over all is placed an iron tube, made tight for mechanical protection against pickaxes in the street. The main has no box or brickwork, as it is put naked into the earth. The outer tube is of wrought iron a quarter of an inch thick, sufficiently flexible to bend at right angles without breaking, and strong enough to resist any weight over it without damage. There will be a joint for service at each twenty feet, so that every house can have the light if required. The main is absolutely safe. A man can touch the naked copper with impunity, as it is already, as it is technically called, 'to earth.' He is on the earth, and is, therefore, touching earth. The only way in which he could get a shock is by cutting the main open and getting to the interior tube, but he would have to cut through the iron, a thickness of copper and the insulation before he could reach the point where damage could be done. There is the same protection against danger from the connecting wires.

Big Joke.

Curious Passenger—Are these conductors all military officers? I notice they wear pretty nice uniforms.

Old Timer—Oh, no; they belong to the railroad police, though; civil officers, you know.

Curious Passenger—Civil officers! Ha! ha! Oh, come now, that's too good. Civil officers! By hokey! that's the best joke I ever heard. I must remember that and spring it on the folks down our way.

When the old timer left the train the curious passenger was chuckling in most ridiculous fashion, and repeating to himself from time to time, "Civil officers! By thunder, but that's a good one!"—Boston Transcript.

Snore-Proof.

Mr. J. A. Morris, of New York, snored while asleep in such a high key that his wife and he agreed to have an addition built to the house in which Mr. Morris was to sleep. He stipulated with the architect that the cost should not exceed $5,000, but his wife ordered it to be made "snore-proof" at a cost of $27,000. The architect, probably a sympathetic man, obeyed the wife and afterwards sued the husband, but the case went in favor of Morris. The architect thought to make him pay through the nose.

A "DAUGHTER OF THE LORD."

How Her Heirs Sought to Claim the Church, But the Verdict Was the Other Way.

There has just been decided a very remarkable suit in Philadelphia, the verdict being favorable to the defendants. More than 40 years ago there came an emigrant woman to this country from Switzerland. Her name was Anna Meister, and to the ordinary observer she seemed but a common Swiss peasant, with nothing to distinguish her from the herd. She tried her hand at two or three things without much success, including dressmaking, and then suddenly announced that she was "the daughter of the Lord," that she was sacred, and that as she was of the essence of the Holy Ghost she could perform no manual labor. She had traces and "signs," and finally gathered a congregation of Germans about her, who ever since provided her with all sorts of luxuries. They worshipped her under the name of J. Elmar Mira Mitta, supported her while she travelled luxuriously in Europe, and when the people who owned the house in which she lived were about to sell it she told her followers this would be a sacrilege, and they must buy it and make it her church to worship her in. After having lived sumptuously all her life she died not long since in the odor of sanctity, and then her relatives in Switzerland, who seemed to have a good deal of Mira Mitta's nerve, brought suit to claim the church, as her heirs. Happily the decision was in favor of the poor creatures who had toiled and slaved all their lives to keep the peasant woman daintily clad and luxuriously fed in indolence.

Late Scottish News.

The Edinburgh Public Library already contains 50,000 volumes, and it is expected that other 10,000 volumes will be added before the library is opened.

Dr. Robt. W. Reid, of St. Thomas' Hospital, London, has been appointed Professor of Anatomy in the University of Aberdeen, in room of Professor Struthers, resigned.

Shipbuilding on the Clyde, according to the returns for October, continues brisk. The output during the past ten months is 40,167 tons in excess of that for the same period last year.

The Marquis of Lorne on the 26th ult. opened the Victoria Art Galleries at Dundee, which have been erected at a cost of £13,000, in commemoration of Her Majesty's Jubilee.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie, of New York, is evidently doing all he can to get the Free Library Act generally adopted throughout Scotland. He has now offered the people of Peterhead, on condition of their adopting that Act and raising a fund for a building, to give the last £1,000 required for a suitable structure.

We Live Longer.

The average length of life is greater and the standard of bodily health higher than ever before, and if it were not that medical and sanitary skill now preserves for a life of imperfect health many weak persons, who in former times would have succumbed to the first attack of disease, the standard would be even higher. In the words of old writers there are many passages which show that a man was considered old and past his prime at 40, while now at that age one is in the very height of his powers. There may be more diseases now than formerly; but there is less disease, and a vastly greater knowledge of how to avoid it, or, when attacked, to bring it to a favorable termination.—Hall's Journal of Health.

An Evener.

Salesman—Well, whacher want?

Customer—I want to buy a hat.

Salesman—Why didn't yer say so? Move lively now. This ain't no morgue.

Customer—I don't like to be spoken to like that.

Salesman—Yer don't? Well, whatcher stoppin' the wheels 'f trade fer? Did you ever see a real hat?

Customer—That's enough. Good day.

Salesman—Just wait a moment, sir. I recognize you as the ticket seller at the Imperial Central station. I tried to buy a ticket of you yesterday, and I've just endeavored to give you an imitation of the way you treated me. What's the size, sir?—Puck.

House Moving.

Chicago, probably, is the only city in the Union in which the raising and moving of houses, including dwellings and stores of all kinds, can be considered a regular industry. There are about 100 firms in the city who engage in the business and find it extremely profitable. Three or four of the leading house-movers have more than $50,000 invested in the business, and have been steadily growing rich at it. One of these furnished some interesting statistics to a reporter for the Times. He volunteeeed the information that there are at least 6,000 people who live off the profits of the business and the wages paid.

Degeneration.

Young Lady—I think that the young men of the present day are very deficient in mental culture, don't you, Mr. Strokhor?

Mr. Strokhor—Very. Why the other day I actually met a young man who didn't know what I meant when I said that Kelly umbled a foul ball.

Tragic Death of an Author.

John Warner, a callow youth of a country town in Delaware, wrote a novel, paid a publisher $1,000 to put it in the market, and because only five copies were sold in a year the author went out to the dear old woods and hanged himself. Had he done this at first it would have been money in his pocket.—Detroit Free Press.

A Colored Voice.

Friend—What color are your baby's eyes?

Fond Father—I don't really know; but I have discovered that his voice is yeller.

The man who is mean to his own children is usually very good to the children of others.

"The servants are getting worse and worse every day," said Mrs. Weary. "The last cook I had could not even boil water without burning it."

Baby's Bedtime Song.

Sway to and fro in the twilight gray,
This is the ferry for Shadowtown;
It always sails at the end of day,
Just as the darkness is closing down.

Rest, little head, on my shoulder, so,
A sleepy fare is the only fare;
Drifting away from the world we go,
Baby and I in a rocking chair.

See where the fire-logs glow and spark,
Glitter the lights of Shadowland;
The pelting rains on the window, hark
Are ripples lapping upon its strand.

There where the mirror is glancing dim,
A lake with its shimmering cool and still;
Blossoms are waving above its brim,
Those over there on the window-sill.

Rock slow, more slow in the dusky light,
Silently lower the anchor down;
Dear little passenger say good night,
We've reached the harbor of Shadowtown.

SCOTCH HUMOR.

It Does Not Seem to be of a Very Lively Character.

In order to disprove the frequent assertion that the Scotch are not humorous, says the New York Sun, the editor of a Scottish paper recently declared his columns open and invited all the jokes of the people which his constituents would send to him. These are fair samples of what were handed in:

"Two boys having met a man in white 'spats' one of them says he wore 'white penter's breeks below his ither anes.'"

"This is but the forefront of the battle—'tis rare, what this boy said 'in a waggery.'"

"A woman, having forsworn whisky in a g'ass, drank it out of a cup."

"A man took the hat worn by a scarecrow."

"Whiskey having been ordered for outward application the patient drank it."

"A man, having eaten a herring at tea, wished also for some treacle, which was refused."

"A boy, being asked if he had 'passed the doctor'—in a medical examination—said, 'Yes, I passed him up at Cochrane's corner.'"

"A clergyman said that he would visit the families in his district, 'embracing the servant girls as he went along.'"

"An undertaker, being asked to pray at a funeral, said he would rather make a coffin gratis."

"A woman in a shop, wishing to ask for a dolman, asked for a donkey."

"A horse falling down dead, a man asked, 'Did it ever do that before?'"

"Heaven was defined as a place where 'whiskey is plentiful and policemen scarce.'"

"'Have you seen Tom since he left?' 'No; but I'm gaun tae write tae him tae speir his address.'"

Intellectually the Scotch are one of the very greatest people in the world, but they don't seem to be very funny.

The Deepest Hole in the World.

The deepest bore in the world, claimed at different times for a number of places, is, according to the latest accounts, at Schladebach, a small German village near Leipsic. It measures 1,748 metres, or about 5,735 feet. The time expended boring to this depth amounted to six years, at a cost of $52,000. A peculiar experience encountered in connection with this and other deep holes in different parts of Germany is, according to Unland's Wochenschraft, that the observed temperature, while steadily increasing with the depths, show a smaller ratio of increase in the lower strata.

A Good Word for the Sparrow.

To the enemies of the English sparrows, who are making an unavailing attempt to eliminate the plucky little creatures from the list of European immigrants to this country, the British Consul at Baltimore points out that as a result of the terrible mortality resulting from the blizzard of March, 1888, there has been an increase of grubs and caterpillars corresponding to the decrease in sparrows. The sparrows eat the larvæ of destructive insects, preferring, so to speak, the egg to the chicken; but they get little credit for their usefulness.—Philadelphia Record.

New Way to Advertise.

Brown—And so you have got a first-rate cook? What paper did you advertise in?

Fogg—Didn't advertise in any. My wife told Mrs. Gray we wanted a girl, but made her promise not to tell anybody.

"Well?"

"Well, we had the door bell ringing for a fortnight from morning till night. No less than a hundred applications for the place."

Wanted It Good.

"Are you fond of music?" asked Mrs. Symphony of an elderly relative from the country.

"Well, yes, I am," was the careful reply; "that is, when it's good music, Laury. Now, you take a good accordeum an' a fiddle an' a pair o' bones an' a flute an' let 'em all play 'Old Nicodemus' all at the same time, an' I tell you it's sweet!"—Harper's Bazar.

An Autumnal Proposal.

He (as they stand on the balcony) It is very bright within and very dreary without, is it not?

She—Without what?

He (inspired)—You.

But Probable Loss.

Namby—I just lent $10 to Pamby; I wish you would make an item of it, Mr. Bookkeeper.

Bookkeeper—Shall I debit it to cash?

"I guess you don't know Pamby very well. Put it in the profit and loss account."

—Last night two tramps from Hamilton registered at the police cells. Their names were John Eagan, aged 45, and Michael McCaball, aged 40. They left this morning on their way to London.—Brantford Telegram.

"What is your salary, Dr. Stiggins?" "My salary," said the clergyman slowly, "is $3,000. But my pay is about $1,200."

The pay-roll of officers and sailors in the United States Navy this year will amount to nearly $8,000,000. The feeding and clothing of the men will cost another million and a half.

COUNTY AND DISTRICT.

We understand Mr. Thos. Hambly, of Albermarle, father of the Baltic vicitm, is taking steps in bringing an action for damages against the Great Northern Transit Co. for the loss of his son, and has retained A. B. Klein of Walkerton as his Solicitor.—[Owen Sound Advertiser

An Owen Sound despatch says :—Last night about 11 o'clock as Mr. Chas. Fox, sr., with his son, was standing on the upper deck of the steambarge Algonquin, he stumbled and fell down the forward hatchway, striking on his head on the main deck. He was picked up unconscious by Capt. Moore and the son, and carried to the captain's room. Mr. Fox is a brother of Mr. John Fox, well-known in municipal matters in this town. Mr. Fox has since died.

The Musical Journal for November contains some very interesting articles, worthy of perusal by both professional and amateur musicians. It is well edited, well printed, and should be well supported. The subscription is very small (50 cents per annumn), thus placing it within the reach of everyone. We commend it to our readers. Timms Moore & Co., Publishers, Oxford Press, Toronto.

Looking for it in England.

The demand in England for the Christmas number of the Montreal Star is something unheard of—a great compliment to Canadian enterprise. It is quite encouraging to hear English and Scotch people, where ever you go on the other side, saying: "The Christmas Star was the best of them all." The great American news companies are urging the publishers to sell the Christmas Star in the States, but there will not be more than enough to fill the Canadian demand. There are four supplements with the Christmas Star this year.

The Great Northwest

joins the other parts of the Dominion in its praises of the wonderful virtues of Nasal Balm. Mr. Wm. H. Sharp, Trebene, Man., says :—I am delighted to be in a position to say that Nasal Balm is helping me wonderfully, although I have been using it but a very short time. It speedily cleared out the head and stopped the disagreeable droppings into the throat. For some time I have suffered severely from catarrhal head ache, Nasal Balm has removed every trace of it. I have confidence in its completely curing me. It is deserving of all you claim for it: "A positive cure for catarrh. Easy and pleasant to use." I hope it will soon be for sale in every town and village in Manitoba.

Hard at Work.

Nearely one hundred Eminent Persons are now engaged in preparing valuable and important contributions to The Youth's Companion for 1890. Mr. Gladstone is getting together his reminiscencs of Motley the Historian; Justin McCarthy is writing all his personal recollections of great Prime Ministers; Sir Morell Mackenzie is thinking of what he shall say to The Companion readers on the training of their voices in youth; Captain Kennedy is recalling the exciting episodes of his five hundred different trips across the Atlantic, and making notes for his articles; P. T. Barnum is preparing the account of how he secured his White Elephant; General Wolseley is arranging to tell the boys how to endure hardships; Carroll D. Wright is securing statistics about the boy and girl laborers of America, what they do and what they earn; Hon. James G. Blaine is writing a paper for our young politicians; popular authorities are at work on serial stories; the Presidents of the three leading American colleges will give advice to boys on their future; Tyndall and Shaler are to talk about the wonders of nature; Marion Harland promises to entertain the girls, while Lieutenant Schwatka will take the boys in imagination to the lowest place in the United States. There are hundreds of pleasures in store for The Companion readers for 1890. Every one is hard at work, as you see. $1.75 will admit you to 52 weeks of these entertainments.
